MORNINGS AMONG THE JESUITS AT ROME.

INTRODUCTION.

IN committing the following pages to the press, it is felt that some few words of introduction are required, to account for their origin, and to explain their nature.

Having visited Rome, not only to gratify and indulge my taste for the arts among the most exquisite sculptures and the most beautiful pictures, the greatest miracles of art in the world,—having visited that city not only that I might look at the ruins, the glorious ruins, of the temples and baths and palaces of the conquerors of the world, and to wander among those scenes where lived and walked the heroes of the past, but also and chiefly that I might see and study the true genius of the Church of Rome, and judge for myself as to her nature and character, I felt it to be my duty to avail myself of every means in my power to obtain information on the subject.

Two sources of information immediately presented themselves. One was derived from my own means and opportunities for personal observation: I therefore carefully attended all the various services of the Church,—was a watchful observer at every procession,—attended every exhibition of reliques,—was at every church on all unusual ceremonials,—attended every place at which the Pope or the Cardinals were expected,—took my place at every ordination, at every funeral of Cardinals or Bishops, at every reception into a nunnery, at the celebration of every festival, in short, at everything that could give opportunity for judging of the true nature and character of the system, as exhibited in its outward manifestation of services, ceremonials and festivals. And I am bound to acknowledge the debt of gratitude, which I owe to some members of the Society of Jesuits, and to some lay gentlemen of Rome, for the extreme kindness and courtesy with which they facilitated the prosecution of my object, securing to me access to places where otherwise I could not have been admitted. The results of my observations thus made have already been published in my account of “A PILGRIMAGE TO ROME.” The second source of information was not so dependent upon myself, but was opened to me by circumstances as unexpected as they were gratifying. I allude to the opportunity of close intercourse with many members of the priesthood, by which I might learn their opinions and feelings, and receive their explanations of all that was passing around me. It arose from the following circumstance. During my constant attendance at all the services of the Church of Rome, I was observed by a Roman gentleman who held office in the Papal court; and being acquainted with him, he remarked one day to my wife, that I seemed much interested in these things, and asked whether I would not like to make the acquaintance of some of the clergy. Having learned from her my wishes to that effect, he called some days after to say he had been with his personal friend the Padre Generale,—the Father-General of the Jesuits, and had mentioned to him my wish to enter into communication with the clergy, and he seemed to intimate that this was sure to convert me to the Church of Rome. He added that the Father-General had directed two members of the order to wait on me, to give me any information which I might desire. These gentlemen came in due course. They soon presented me to others. They introduced me to the professors of their establishment, the Collegio Romano, and thus a series of conversations or conferences on the subject of the points at issue between the Churches of England and Rome, commenced and were carried on, as occasion offered, during the whole period of my residence at Rome. A portion of my notes of these conversations constitutes this present volume, of “MORNINGS AMONG THE JESUITS AT ROME.”

Since the former editions of these notes, some persons have expressed a doubt, and others have uttered a denial of the Father-General of the Order having had any part or knowledge of their conversations. I can of course have no means of resolving such a doubt or contradicting such a denial. I can only know, that the Roman gentleman who proposed the arrangement for our interviews, informed me that he had himself communicated personally with the Father-General on the subject, and that the visits of the Jesuits were in obedience to his directions. He probably communicated with the immediate superior at the Collegio Romano, who selected the individuals. I have not a shadow of doubt as to the perfect honor and truthfulness of my informant, who was an earnest and religious Roman Catholic.

These visits were not mere visits of courtesy. They were made in obedience to authority. They were made with the frank avowal of an intention to induce me to enter the Church of Rome. They were not less than twenty in number, and, without a single exception, were exclusively devoted to those religious topics which suited the object they had in view. The Jesuits never concealed their intentions from myself, nor their hopes from others, and—especially as I had never revealed their names—I have ever felt there could be no breach of confidence in publishing, for the instruction of others, the arguments by which they endeavoured to entangle me, and the means by which I was enabled to escape them.

I dealt with all frankness with these several gentlemen, as to the object of their visit. They were under the impression, which they were at no pains to conceal, that I was disposed favorably towards their Church ;—that I was one of those Anglican clergymen who neither understand nor love the Church of England, and who, in a restless dissatisfaction and love of change, are prepared to abandon her communion for that of Rome, and who only wait a little encouragement and perhaps instruction, before taking the last step. I was very careful to undeceive them, stating that I should be most happy to confer with them on the differences between the two Churches, but that I could not do so under a false colour,—that I was devotedly attached in judgment and in feeling to the Church of England,—that I looked on her as the Church of God in England, and the most pure, most apostolic, most scriptural of all the churches of Christendom,—that, without unchurching other churches, she was still the church of my judgment and of my affections ; and that I had never for a moment harboured the thought of abandoning her for any other church, and especially for the Church of Rome.

My new friends, for such their subsequent conduct proved them to be, seemed surprised at the decision of my opinions ; and expressed their wonder, that I could refuse to hold communion with the Church of Rome.

I stated that I felt very strong objections, as they appeared to me, against that Church ; but that if those objections were removed,—if they, who were Priests of the Church of Rome, could remove them,—if they, living at the fountain-head of that Church, could prove them futile, in that case they should find me free to act, and prepared to act on my enlightened convictions, and I would without hesitation join their communion.

They generally asked me to state my objections, as they felt assured that they should be able to remove them.

This invitation led to a series of conferences or conversations with some of these gentlemen. We ranged through a very large portion of the entire field of controversy between the Churches of England and Rome, and much was elicited that was perfectly new to me ;—new, chiefly as indicative of the opinions and feelings of the enlightened and learned members of the priesthood ; and I was sometimes startled at the opinions expressed and the feelings avowed, as exhibiting a phase of mind and feeling, which had heretofore seemed to me incompatible with enlightenment and education. I have learned, and must bear about me for ever the memory of the lesson, never again to regard the extremes of credulity as inconsistent with the most scientific attainments ; or to suppose that what seems the most absurd and marvellous superstition, is incompatible with the highest education ; or to think that the utmost prostration of the mind is inconsistent with the loftiest range of intellectual power. There was in some of my friends an extraordinary amount of scientific attainments, of classical erudition, of polite literature, and of great intellectual acumen ; but all seemed subdued and held, as by an adamantine grasp, in everlasting subjection to what seemed to them to be the religious principle. This principle, which regarded the voice of the Church of Rome as the voice of God Himself, was ever uppermost in the mind, and held such an influence and a mastery over the whole intellectual powers, over the whole rational being, that it bowed with the humility of a child before every thing, that came with even the apparent authority of the Church. I never could have believed the extent of this, if I had not witnessed it in these remarkable instances. They seemed to regard the canons of the Church, precisely as we regard the decisions of Scripture ; and just as we regard any unbelief of the statements of Holy Scripture as Infidelity, so they regard every doubt as to the judgment of the Church as the worst Infidelity. It seemed as if a doubt of it never cast its shadow across their minds.

But my friends argued in these conferences at a considerable disadvantage. They imagined, that I was unacquainted with the controversy between the churches,—that I was disposed in my principles and views to join the Church of Rome,—that I was already convinced that I ought to join her communion, and that my objections were only a sort of make-believe. They imagined that I entered on these conferences in an easy, free, unprepared state, and without any view to controversy ; and they therefore were induced to express themselves more freely and openly, less guardedly than perhaps they otherwise would have done. This placed them in some respects at a disadvantage, which I am bound in candour to acknowledge ; and one that was particularly serviceable to me, as calculated to secure to me the more free expression of their real sentiments and feelings. But at the same time it was not without its disadvantages to myself. I dared not distinctly assume the position of a Protestant controversialist, as it would in the first place have led to their immediate withdrawal from all communication with me ; and in the next place, in case I exhibited anything like a proselytising spirit, there was every probability that my passports would be sent to me, with orders from the police to withdraw from Rome. This necessitated great caution on my part, and obliged me to hold back many things that I might otherwise have urged, and in all faithfulness should have urged ; and it obliged me to confine myself to one object, namely, the obtaining information as to the sentiments and feelings of the Priests at Rome. If I could draw them out,—if I could elicit their real mind,—if I could ascertain the real nature of their religion,—and their mode of argument as developed in free and familiar conversation,—if I could occasionally advance an objection that might awaken a doubt, or suggest a new train of thought in their minds, which might ultimately lead to better things, then I should have obtained all I could under the circumstances reasonably hope or expect to obtain. And thus we all laboured, both they and myself, under certain disadvantages, and to this must be attributed, by the gentle and Christian reader, many of the peculiarities that characterise these conferences, and strip them of much of the point and life and spirit of antagonism which some persons might have expected.

In all these conversations I acted for the best, and to the best of my feeble judgment. If I have done wrong, either in my close examination of the services of the Roman Church, or in my mode of conducting these conversations, I have only to bow my head in meekness, and pray that He, whom I desire to serve, may pardon His servant.

I have now only to add in reference to the accuracy of these notes, that they were always written on the very day on which each conversation was held. While actually in conversation, I often made it a point to make a note of what they said, and my mode of doing so was not discourteous, but seemed at the time to be giving importance to their words, as if they appeared to me deserving of an accurate record. But on every occasion, without exception, the moment they left me I immediately committed the whole to paper. The conversations, as now presented to the public, are very little else than an accurate transcript of some of my notes thus taken at the time.

I may not presume to say that there are no mistakes as to the arguments, and as to the meaning of my opponents, but I may say without any hesitation, that there are no intentional misrepresentations. To err, by mistake, is unhappily a misfortune incident to human nature; to misrepresent by design, is a sin against Christianity.

When this narrative of these interviews was first published, an attempt was made by many of the members of the Church of Rome, and by others whose sympathies are with that Church, to create an impression, that these conversations were never really held, and that they were purely “imaginary conversations.” Having however communicated with Rome on the subject, it was soon ascertained, that they were real; and one reverend Jesuit, Padre Mazio, the Professor of Canon Law in the Collegio Romano, at once recognised and acknowledged those in which he was himself engaged. The result has been the publication of a Review of this Volume, in a Roman Catholic periodical called, The Rambler;—written in part by my opponents at Rome, and in part by my opponents in England, with a view to vindicate the Order of Jesuits, to answer my arguments, and to impeach the accuracy of my narrative. It may be presumed therefore to be the best reply that they can offer. I purpose to republish in this Edition the whole of their arguments verbatim, as proposed by themselves, and to append them at the close of each conversation to which they may refer. The enquirer after truth will thus possess, not only my narrative of these conversations, but also the replies or comments of my opponents, as arranged and published by themselves. I shall thus act with all fairness towards them; for though I respect their talents, I have no fear of their arguments.

There are some statements, however, which, as they are no part of the argument, will be most suitably considered here. They say,—

“The first book on our list is, indeed, scarcely to be classed with the more openly antichristian weapons which are forged by the enemies of the Church. Many a person will account us guilty of uncharitableness while we ascribe it to that Evil One who is ever employing his servants in his miserable cause. And of course, when we speak of Mr. Seymour, we speak of him only as he appears in his writings and past public acts. Of himself we say nothing, as we know nothing of his private history. It is not absolutely beyond the range of possibility that he should be in a state of invincible ignorance ; though in all honesty we must admit that a less creditable and honourable publication we have not often seen. It has indeed so little to recommend it, either in the way of ability or candour, that we had no thoughts of noticing it, until we heard that it had made some noise in the Protestant world, and that persons of sense considered that “ it ought to be answered.” A hasty glance at its pages, also, so closely betrayed its character, that—to tell the whole truth—we were unwilling to wade through Mr. Seymour’s lengthy descriptions, unless absolutely compelled. However, to our surprise, we learnt that the book was accounted unanswerable ; and some of our own readers, both Catholic and Protestant, wishing to see it reviewed, unwillingly we undertook the task.

“ But first we took the very natural precaution of ascertaining how far Mr. Seymour’s fictions were even founded on fact. Having a lively recollection of the author’s affair—not of honour—with a certain brother Protestant clergyman a few years ago, and, moreover, being tolerably sure that Mr. Seymour knew little or nothing of the Italian language, we wrote to one of the Jesuits with whom he held his conversations, and with whom we happen to be acquainted, and put to him one or two questions respecting Mr. Seymour’s interviews. All our suspicions Father Mazio has confirmed. He informs us that the very title of this book was an untruth, for that there had been but two Mornings’ Discussions between Jesuits and Mr. Seymour ; that though he himself had paid Mr. and Mrs. Seymour a few visits of courtesy, in which religious subjects had been among others talked of, yet that the real disputation were simply two.”

It will not be expected—as unbecoming in those who seek and love the truth—that I should waste words in reply to the spirit of personality, exhibited here and elsewhere.

I cite this passage, as proving that my opponents have thought it worthwhile to communicate with the Jesuits at Rome on the subject—as proving further that the reality of those interviews is acknowledged—and as proving practically their accuracy, since one of the Jesuits recognises and acknowledges those conversations in which he was himself a disputant. The narrative must needs be accurate which is thus recognized, after the lapse of four years! As to the statement, that the “very title of the book is an untruth, for that there had been but two Mornings’ Discussions,” I have only to say, that the title of the book is simply “Mornings among the Jesuits,” and they were not less than twenty in number. Of these, two were of a formal nature, and were held in consequence of a challenge from Padre Passaglia, the Professor of Dogmatic Theology, and the others were of the nature of conversations, in which the Jesuits undertook to remove my objections to communion with the Church of Rome;—and, so far from being mere visits of courtesy, were avowedly undertaken, in obedience to authority, and with a view to my conversion. They say again;—

“In order to give more importance to his book—we quote Father Mazio’s remarks almost word for word—and to glorify himself by shewing that he had fought with and foiled many of the ablest Jesuits at Rome, he has, by a romantic fiction, multiplied his opponents. Of one Jesuit he has made no less than five. The Jesuit of the first chapter, who is represented as describing at large the Institute of the Society; the Jesuit in the second chapter, who was first introduced to Mr. Seymour; the priest of great attainments who held a position of great influence in the Church, and who forms the subject of the fifth chapter; the professor of Canon Law spoken of in the whole seventh chapter; the other Jesuit, of whom so much is said in the eighth chapter, are but different representations of one poor Jesuit, Padre Mazio! It is false that he after his first introduction to Mr. Seymour, introduced two other Jesuits to him, who remained with him some hours. The only persons whom Father Mazio introduced in subsequent and different times were Mr. Connelly and Dr. Grant the rector of the Scotch College at Rome, who were not Jesuits, besides Father Passaglia, with whom, as has been said, two conferences were held. When visiting the Roman College, Mr. Seymour was presented to the librarian, Father Secchi, with whom he spoke very little, and then to Father Marchi, in the Museum, with whom he had a rather long conversation. Father Mazio is not aware that Mr. Seymour had any intercourse with any other Jesuit in Rome."

The meaning of all this—separated from the spirit of personality—is that my interviews were principally held with one, instead of with several Jesuits, and that I had intercourse with only a few members of the Order at Rome. This, though unimportant, as not affecting any argument, is incorrect. It is here acknowledged, however, by my opponents, that I had the opportunity of conversing with several of their most eminent members ; as Padre Mazio, Professor of Canon Law ; Padre Passaglia, Professor of Dogmatic Theology ; Padre Marchi, Professor of Archæology ; Padre Secchi, the Librarian, and Mr. Conolly, a Probationer of the Order, and a Preceptor in the College of Nobles. And whereas it is stated that "Padre Mazio is not aware that Mr. Seymour had any intercourse with any other Jesuit at Rome," it is manifest that such a statement could never have come from that Jesuit himself, inasmuch as he paid me ten or twelve visits, each of them of some hours' duration, and came on each occasion accompanied by a second Jesuit,—it being a rule of the Order at Rome that no Jesuit shall be seen outside the Collegio Romano, unless accompanied by another member of the Order. In simple truth, I had ample opportunity for such interviews. And I feel assured that all persons, who are acquainted with Rome, and the infinity of churches, ruins, galleries, antiquities, classic, Etruscan and Mediæval, with the endless variety of pictures, of sculptures, and all the high ceremonies and processions of the Church, to be visited and examined, will feel that when I appropriated twenty days to so many controversial interviews with various Jesuits, it was quite sufficient for my purpose, without seeking other opponents. The conversations now published, were held with four different persons, but principally with Padre Mazio, and always in the presence of a second Jesuit.

I now commit my narrative, together with the replies of my opponents, to the reader. I shall introduce them by first giving a sketch of the principles of the Order, as communicated by one of themselves.

CHAPTER I.

THE ORDER OF THE JESUITS—CONTRASTED WITH THE OTHER ORDERS —SUPERIORITY IN LEARNING, AND CHARACTER, AND EXERTION—THE GREAT AND MASTER PRINCIPLE OF THE SYSTEM ; UNLIMITED OBEDI-ENCE—CAPACITY FOR GREAT EFFORTS—THE CONSTITUTIONS ON THE POINT OF OBEDIENCE—CONVERSATION WITH A JESUIT ON THIS SUB-JECT—CONFIRMATION OF THE WORST THINGS CHARGED AGAINST THEM—SINGULAR RULE RESPECTING MASSES—EARLY ADMISSION TO THE VOWS—THE MORAL CHARACTER OF THE JESUITS—EXTRACTS FROM THE PAPAL BULLS SUPPRESSING THE ORDER AND AFTERWARDS RESTORING IT.

IT is impossible for any one, who has resided for any reasonable period at Rome, to help being impressed with the high position of the order of the Jesuits. Indeed the extraordinary ability, zeal, and learning of the order, might well prepare one for expecting something of the kind in the city of the church. However prejudiced against them, however mindful of all that religionists have uttered against them, of all that politicians and statesmen have planned against them, of all the fearful things that have been gathered from their writings ; and of all that the page of history has recorded, still one is constrained at Rome, in despite of all, to yield respect to the order. Its members stand deservedly high in the estimation of every observant man, who judges only from the appearances that present themselves before him. There is the wide extent and range of their learning, there is the large amount of their talents, there is their zeal for religion ; and there is the appearance of the strictest morality in their lives.

It often occurs however, in our experience of the world, that we see some men rise by the fall of others ; and witness the character of one man created and sustained by the ruin of another. Character is thus often made by contrast, so that even when not good in itself it seems good in comparison with others. There is much of this in the high reputation achieved by the Jesuits in Rome ; at least much of it seemed to me attributable to this, for nothing can be more marked than the contrast between the order of the Jesuits, and the other religious orders, whether Augustinians, Franciscans, Dominicans, Camaldolines, or any other of the countless series. The Jesuits are devoted to study, and remarkable for learning and cultivated talents, while the others seem steeped to the lips in ignorance and indifference. The Jesuits are zealous, stirring, active, untiring in the cause of their religion and their church, while the others are inactive, lazy, indolent, and careless of everything. There are many exceptions—most honourable exceptions, among the members of those orders, amidst whom there are some whose activity, learning and morals, would be an ornament to any body of men in the world ; but these are too few to save the general character of the monks and friars at Rome, of the city of Rome ; for those remarks are not intended to apply to those of other cities, and other lands, where I have had no means of observation. In the city of Rome the monks and friars, with the exception of the Jesuits, have no one characteristic to recommend them to the wise and good ; and the absence of learning—the lazy indifference—the occasions of scandal, so unhappily characteristic of many, has so strongly contrasted with the learning, the activity, and the moral lives of the Jesuits, that it may well be believed that the good character of one, is built in a great measure on the ill character of the others. The Church of St. Peter's is not more striking and prominent among the other churches of this city of churches, than is the order of Jesus among the other orders of this city of convents.

It was thus at least that it appeared to me ; and yet my pilgrimage to Rome was commenced with feelings of extreme and intense distaste for the Jesuits, and that distaste has become deeply rooted and inveterate, from a close and personal examination of the system of the order. Personally acquainted as I was with some members of the order, I am bound in all candour and honesty to say, that I found them polished, refined, well-informed, and learned ; and in all my intercourse with them I found them courteous, obliging, and zealous ; and while I feel they are utterly in error in all their principles of morality and religion, I yet also feel that they were perfectly sincere in the profession they had made. Hence, though I commenced my intercourse with much distrust, I closed it with many regrets, parting with men whose talent and zeal had commanded my respect, whose personal character had won my regard, and whose many obliging acts of courtesy and kindness, in facilitating the objects of my pilgrimage, have placed me under obligations which I were ungrateful to forget.

It was in my intercourse with the Jesuits, that I learned to appreciate the importance of that which I regard as the secret, the mystery of the order. I allude to that which is the grand idea—the great principle—the living soul of the system, and which has enabled a few priests to wield the learning and science—the talent and genius—the religious superstitions and political intrigues of mankind. In a most interesting conversation with a very polished and influential member of the order, he was commanding it for its morality, and detailing its discipline. Having become warm and excited on the subject, he gave vent to his enthusiasm for the order, and expressed himself less guardedly than usual, so that I found no great difficulty in leading him to express himself freely on the precise point on which I desired information. He stated that the great and cardinal principle was, that OBEDIENCE was the greatest Christian duty, and HUMILITY the highest Christian virtue, and that this principle was the grand element of their power. He showed how in their earliest schooling they trained the mind to the most strict and rigid obedience, bending everything so as to impart the principle of obedience, and create the habit of obedience: and in the end, admission to the order is secured only through the vow of the most implicit and unquestioning obedience. When admitted into the order there is no right to judge or question, to demur or hesitate, as to any command that may be issued by the General and Council of the order; the duty of every member being to render, in all humility, a simple and unhesitating obedience. And when in their retreat—in that period of each year when every member is obliged to retire from his stated employments, that he may in his prescribed retirement give himself more uninterruptedly to the examination of his heart and to the cultivation of private devotion—when in that retreat in which, according to the directions of Ignatius Loyola, they are specially to dwell on the three-fold enquiry—whence they have come and what they have been doing—what they are now accomplishing for the glory of God—and whether they are going for the unfathomed eternity—when in that retreat, and in answer to the last enquiry, they resolve to live more to God, and to devote themselves, body, soul, and spirit, with all their affections and intellects, to his glory; they then come forth with deep and fixed resolve, to render in all humility a more implicit and unhesitating obedience than ever to the mandates of those, who are to order all things in the church. This principle of obedience is fixed and rooted deeply; so deeply that it were as hard to uproot it as to uproot the belief of a God or of a religion. The mind, habituated to regard it as the first and last thing, as the very essence of all true religion, grows so imbued and impressed with the duty of humble obedience, that it becomes the veriest slave, the unshaking and unhesitating instrument of those who rule the order. My friend, who was himself one of the most accomplished among them, stated that they were carefully taught from the first beginning, to suppress every doubt or hesitation as contrary to the humility that becomes them; and to still and silence every tendency to question the propriety of any command from those in authority, as if it were positive pride and rebellion. He said that in all the sayings and actions of the members, they are saying and acting in obedience to authority; and that in almost everything in which individual Jesuits are the objects of praise or censure, they deserve neither the one nor the other,—the praise and censure belonging properly to the General and council of the order, and not to the individual Jesuit. He stated, as illustrating the theory and practice of obedience, that himself and all others were completely in the power and under obedience to the General of the order—that if the General sends for him, and desires him to undertake the conduct of an university, he has only to bow and retire and then forthwith prepare himself to obey; and that if the General desires him to resign that position and to become the mere door-porter or messenger of some family or establishment in any land, he has only to bow and withdraw to prepare for immediate obedience. And yet further, that if the General directs him to proceed as a Missionary to China—to the Indians of America, or the savages of Africa, he can only bow and take his leave, in order to give a ready obedience. This matter is carried so far, that not unfrequently a member may be one day the porter of a convent in France, and the next day the private secretary or minister of a Prince in Germany; on one day he may be the confessor of a monarch, and the next day the master of some village school. The General of the order with his council resolves on some purpose. The members of the order are the instruments to be employed. The commands are given; the obedience is rendered, and the whole purpose accomplished without any one of the instruments knowing, or even inquiring, anything respecting it.

In order to have fitting and adequate instruments always in readiness for any purpose or emergency, the same principle of humble obedience is brought into action. The mental and intellectual calibre of every member is well and accurately known. Those who have been instructed in their schools are well and closely watched from the beginning, and every act and word that indicates character is carefully registered, and may be ascertained in a moment. Among the young members in general, when the mind or taste or intellectual powers of any exhibit a leaning in any particular direction, it is carefully noted, and all the energies and time are authoritatively directed into that channel. My friend informed me, that if a young scholar exhibited any marked capacity or taste for languages, the General of the order immediately desired him to apply himself exclusively, for so many years, to the study of those languages. Obedience is immediately rendered. If a young novice exhibits any striking leanings to mathematics or other science, the General at once directs that he shall devote himself for so many years to the sole pursuit of such science. If other young members show a taste and aptitude for theological controversies—or for antiquarian lore, or for polite literature, or for political intrigue, the General directs that the studies of each shall be devoted uninterruptedly to his congenial pursuit; and every possible facility and encouragement is then given, to enable each to acquire a consummate skill, a thorough mastery of the subject. This direction of the General is immediately followed by obedience, and in some instances many years are freely appropriated to accomplish the full efficiency of the member in his congenial study. And the result is and must be the fitness—the perfect fitness of a great number of men, for a great variety of purposes, so that whatever be the purpose, the General may feel he has a fitting and adequate agent prepared and willing to accomplish it. Whether he needs one as confessor in some courtly circle, or as a preacher to some rabble multitude—whether as the principal of some university, or as the village school-master of some distant valley—whether as private tutor in some family of influence, or as a footman to act as a spy in some important family—whether as a learned and subtle controversialist, or as a meek and gentle and courtly friend to insinuate his opinions—in short, whatever be the object to be accomplished, in any land or any rank, there are the persons already prepared and fitted as able and adequate instruments. The General speaks the word—names the person, and receives the most ready and implicit obedience.

A system like this, so truly adapted to the purpose contemplated, will naturally supply the General and his Council with the most accomplished instruments for their purpose, whatever that purpose be. And it is this that has so greatly exalted the character for science, theology, and literature, so deservedly obtained by the Jesuits. There may not perhaps be many among them who excel in many of the sciences, but there are men who have arrived at the utmost excellence in some one favourite science; so that there is more real learning and more cultivated talent in the single order of Jesus than in all the other religious bodies together; and this, combined as it is with zeal for religion, activity for their order, and unimpeached morality, gives and secures a pre-eminence in influence and respectability, before which the other communities are compelled to yield. But it must not be supposed that every Jesuit is talented and learned and active. There are as dull, and stupid, and ignorant persons among them, as among others; but when the General sees one of these useless members,— useless at least for one purpose—he makes him useful for another. He directs such men to celebrate the mass in some unimportant place, or he appoints them as the sacristans or sextons, or other attendants on the churches, ceremonies and processions, or he disperses them into retired villages, or places them in convents, and so makes them useful for some of those ordinary occasions where neither talent nor learning nor courtly address are required. But in so large a multitude of men, with whose education all possible pains have been taken, there must always be a considerable portion deeply learned and highly accomplished. This is the fact, and the result is that there is no purpose to be achieved, whether in politics or in religion—whether of subtle intrigue, or of darker crime, for which a ready and fitting agent may not be found among either the ordained or unordained—the priestly or lay members of the order. Whatever is required, there is the instrument ready, and prepared to obey.

While these interesting revelations came from my friend, under the impression that he was exalting the power and character of the order, by shewing the humility and unselfishness and devotion of the members, as exhibited in their implicit and unquestioning obedience, he seemed not aware that he was giving to the order the very character that made it disliked by me; as shewing that all the members made themselves the mere tools or instruments, to give effect to the designs of the General and his council.

I could not avoid taking the opportunity of a pause in his discourse, to remark to him that this implicit and unquestioning obedience of which he spoke, must sometimes lead them into acts repulsive to their feelings, and opposed to their judgments ; and that I could well suppose the General or other superior issuing to him a command, which he felt he could not consistently obey. It might be in opposition to his judgment—revolting to his feelings, and wholly hostile to his deliberately-formed opinions. Obedience in such a case might prove ruinous to a character which he valued, and ruinous to all his best and most cherished interests ; and to the interests of those near and dear to him.

He replied that under these and all similar circumstances there must still be obedience,—implicit and unquestioning obedience ; and that no Jesuit would hesitate for one moment to yield that obedience. He went on to say that they taught it as a fundamental element in all their education, that the first and highest of all religious duties was obedience ; and that the first and most meritorious of the moral virtues was humility ; in short, that the prime lesson of all revealed religion, and the most meritorious in the sight of God, was humble obedience, and the more implicit and unquestioning it was, the more truly meritorious it was. And as for my objection as to any command opposed to the feeling or the judgment, or inconsistent with the supposed interest of family or nation, he stated that it argued greater humility, modesty, and self-denial to render obedience under such circumstances ; and therefore such obedience was held to be more meritorious in the sight of God. He stated that if such a command was issued to him, he would feel it his undoubted duty to forego his own judgment, to neglect his own feelings, to abandon his own family, to renounce the interests of his country, and to give an implicit and unquestioning obedience ; that such self-denial was meritorious, and that he felt that the amount of merit accruing to him, would be great in proportion to the pain and difficulty he experienced, in so humbling himself as to render such obedience to the desires of the order.

I felt on hearing this, that I might without the risk of giving offence, proceed a step further : I therefore said that this principle might lead to the utter overthrow of all morality and religion, for it was quite possible that the General might issue some command that might be positively immoral and irreligious,—that it might be utterly opposed to all the religious convictions, moral feelings and conscientious scruples of the man,—one that must necessarily bring guilt on his soul, as being an act against all his light and knowledge. I said that in such case, obedience would be sin.

He at once denied my conclusion, saying that the very circumstance of its being against our notions of what was moral and religious—the very circumstance of its being in open hostility to all our convictions, feelings, and conscience, made the act one of greater self-denial, and therefore all the more meritorious. He stated that humility and modesty became the members of the order of Jesus, and that whatever be the private convictions, feelings, or conscience of the individuals, they must at once give way to the declared judgment of the superiors of the order ; that humility requires such surrender ; that duty demands obedience ; that religion demands self-denial, that the more difficult the obedience, the greater the merit, and that as to the character of the act commanded, the responsibility rests not with the subordinate members who obey, but with the superiors who give the command.

I felt that this was a principle that would justify any crime ; and I could not shrink from saying so. I saw that according to this principle, there was no treason against the state, and no villany against individuals, that might not be perpetrated by a Jesuit ; he imagining at the moment, that the more hateful and revolting to his own feelings and convictions the act might be, the more really meritorious it was in the sight of God.

I am not conscious of distorting this deeply-interesting conversation ; it was not originally introduced by me, but by himself, while speaking in very rapturous praise of the Order ; and as he dilated enthusiastically on his theme, he dropt intimations on subjects on which I was desirous of information ; I then merely asked the requisite questions, or led the conversation in the requisite direction. He had been speaking in very pleasing terms of the humility that characterized all the members of the order—of their total renunciation of their property, their feelings, their freedom, for the sake of religion ; of their placing themselves altogether at the disposal of the General and council of fathers, who governed the order. This he enlarged on as an act of great humiliation, greater than that observable in any other religious order ; and wholly unknown in any section of the Protestant churches. He spoke with a deep-seated feeling, with a noble energy and high enthusiasm that perhaps left him unguarded ; and so he was easily led on to dilate on that implicit and unquestioning obedience, which is the grand fruit to be achieved or produced by the humility of the members. When I urged that this might be carried too far—that it might be obeying man against God—that he was placing his feelings, his opinions, his judgment and even his conscience in the hands of the Father-General, and that whereas God has made him responsible, this system made him irresponsible, and capable of perpetrating any act in obedience to authority ; he at once met the objection by stating the principles which under such circumstances would govern himself,—that in the first place it would argue a self-conceited and self-opiniated spirit in him, if he called in question any matter which was determined by the General and council of the order, to whom it belonged to determine what was wise and expedient. And that therefore instead of exercising private judgment he should exhibit self-denial, by practising personal humility, and at once abandon all opinion or judgment of his own, surrendering himself implicitly to the opinion and judgments of his superiors ;—that in the next place he should consider that the more the matter commanded was opposed to his private judgment, revolting to his personal feelings, or wounding to his individual conscience, the more in proportion would be the meritoriousness of obedience under such trying circumstances—a meritoriousness approved and acknowledged as such in the judgment of God, for whose cause all was to be undertaken and effected ;—that in the third place, whatever sinfulness might characterize the matter commanded, and whatever actual guilt before God or man might belong to it, yet all the responsibility for the sin or guilt belonged to the General and council who gave the command, and not to the subordinate member who obeyed it—responsibility specially belonging to the head, and implicit and unquestioning obedience being the only duty of the members.

All this came upon me like an electric shock. I had often read and heard of such things: I had often observed that the whole was involved in the well-known doctrine of the Jesuit writers on morals, called PROBABILITY: i. e., if any man or number of men approve of any act—be that act what it may—then there is a probability, more or less great, than the act may be done lawfully. And, therefore, though our convictions or conscience be against the act, yet we may lawfully act against conviction and conscience, and do the thing, inasmuch as some man or number of men have approved of it, and so there is some probability of lawfulness in its favour. I had habitually read and heard such things cum grano salis, as being unable to conceive a living and breathing man—a learned and educated man—a man outside the walls of a madhouse, actually realizing and avowing such a system. And when I saw before me one of the most polished, educated, refined, and learned men in Rome —when I considered that he was, as far as the eye could judge, amiable, religious, devout: and that he had sacrificed wealth and station in society, that he might save his soul in the order of Jesus; when I considered these things, and heard his sentiments urged with earnestness and energy, —urged as recommendatory of the system on which it is based, it filled me with horror. It was no longer an idea in dim and distant theory, the creature of imagination, and the fiction of romance. It was a living reality.

Perhaps I am not justified in drawing any inferences from some of the intimations which dropped from my friend—I call him such, for I believe him to be sincerely my friend—in the fulness of his love for the order of the Jesuits. But, at all events, it seems certain from his revelations thus made, that if a spy is wanted on any family or person, a Jesuit must be prepared to undertake the office of valet, or footman, or courier, or secretary, or librarian, or confessor, or anything else, in obedience to the command of the General. My friend stated, as an illustration of the humility and obedience of the members, that he himself might be ordered any day to become a servant, or even a porter at the gate, and that he would feel it his duty at once to obey. In his eyes this was an evidence of humility and self-denial ; and he saw not that it might be to my eyes an evidence, that any crafty and subtle member might be appended to any man or any family, as a spy on their actions ; so that in the palace of the monarch, or, in the home of the private gentleman, there may always be a spy to watch his proceedings, and to exert a mysterious influence, while he seems to be a menial, yet wielding all the power of the most powerful order in the world. He may be a tutor to a prince—a chaplain to a bishop—a fellow in a college—a curate of a village—a leader of a faction—or a menial in a family ; and yet all this may be merely the office and position assumed by a Jesuit in obedience to the command of his superiors, thinking his highest duty to be obedience—that the responsibility rests with his superiors, and that its essential merit is altogether his own ! And this it is, as it seems to me, that enables a Christian man to feel pity for the members, while he hates the order. They undertake these hateful and loathsome offices as duties ; they undertake them as duties, despised and detested it may be, but still duties, so essentially duties, that they cannot, on their perverted principles, be declined without sin ; the sin being greater to disobey the command than to perform the act ; and yet again, duties that bring an accumulation of merit to the performer in proportion to his distaste of the performance. A Jesuit is not necessarily a man who finds pleasure in subtleties, intrigues, deceits, crimes, but he is a man who may live in the practice of all these, under the conviction of a religious duty to the commands of his superiors.

One remarkable arrangement in the discipline of the order struck me as exhibiting the power of habit and the influence of principles—of which we know nothing—on some minds. Every ordained Jesuit is obliged to celebrate two masses every week. Every lay Jesuit is bound to attend two masses every week. This of course supposes there is the possibility or facility of doing so; but whether the arrangement refers to those in Rome or other places, I am unable to say. One of these masses is to be celebrated or attended, with the intention that the merits of the sacrifice shall go before God, to forward the religious objects of the member himself. The second mass goes to the General, as it is to be offered with the intention that its merits or efficacy shall be presented before God, to move Him to facilitate and advance whatever object may be in the mind of the General. That object in the mind of the General is unknown; it is assumed to be holy and good, and this second mass is designed to facilitate this unknown object; so that of the two masses to be offered by every member, the merit or efficacy of the one goes to the account of the member himself; and the merit or efficacy of the other to the account of the General! The very existence of such an arrangement, and the acquiescence of astute and rational men in the principle which it involves, is so alien from all our notions of common sense and true religion, that it seems unworthy of even children. One man says a mass with a secret and mental intention that the merits of his act shall be attributed to the secret and mental intention of another man ; wholly unknowing whether that intention be one deserving heaven or hell !

Sometimes the order admits among its members, novices of no youthful age—men of years and experience ; but generally the members are composed of those who had been educated in their schools ; and having exhibited some of those traits of mind and character which would suit them as instruments of the order, they are watched, managed, and admitted to the novitiate, and finally to the order itself, in the fulness of membership : they are often admitted to take the vows at the age of eighteen ! This system, though the very perfection of worldly wisdom for the interests of the order, and the requisite training of the member, is yet unnatural and cruel, as binding under irrevocable vows, those who cannot possibly understand the extent of those vows. There is first the vow of celibacy, by which the novice excludes himself for ever from all the hallowed affections of wife, and children, and home. The second vow is that of poverty, by which the candidate renounces all right and title to all his possessions, making over the same generally to the order itself ; and embracing poverty as his portion, or as they express it, “ accepting the Lord as his portion.” The order, as a body corporate, may be as wealthy as the mines of Petosi, but the individual members are literally penniless : dependent for each article of clothing and each atom of food upon the General and council of the order. The third vow is that of obedience. After the first vow, by which he is snatched from all those affections and ties that would bind him to society, and becomes as it were a solitary in the world—after the second vow, by which he parts with all his present possessions or future rights in property, and by which he is made the more dependent on the commandant of the order—after these, he takes the vow of obedience, making surety doubly sure, and renouncing for ever his own native-born freedom of thought—his own natural liberty of action, and becoming the mere tool and irresponsible instrument pledged to do the bidding of his master—the General of the order. These vows are imposed and taken not unfrequently at the age of eighteen! At that age a youth is induced to take the vow by which he is bound never to marry, though he is as yet wholly unable to comprehend the extent of the vow, or his capacity or incapacity to keep so unnatural a pledge. At that age a youth is induced to renounce all the possessions to which he may be entitled on the death of parents and other relations, when as yet he is too young to know the value of independence or the importance of wealth. At that age, he is induced to take the vow by which he becomes the dependent and bond-slave of men more able and wily than himself; and this before he was able to appreciate the value of independent thought and freedom of action. There is something that outrages every law of nature, in the imposing such vows on a youth of eighteen years; and there is something wrong in the laws of the land, when they refuse to protect those who are unable in their youthfulness to protect themselves. It is the duty of civil law, to shield the young from the cunning craftiness of those who lie in wait to devour them, and to snatch them, helpless as they are, from the jaws of ecclesiastical craft ; but alas ! it is the misery and the curse of Rome and of all Italy, that the civil law is but the engine to strengthen, sanction, and enforce every device and requirement of the ecclesiastical system.

Thus abandoning the ties of life—thus deprived, though by their own act, of all their earthly possessions—thus bound by the vow of obedience, the novices are taken into the training, requisite to draw out and develope those capacities that may make them the most fitting instruments of the order. In due time they are severally placed in those positions, where their fitness for employment may be most surely tested and developed, and according as they approve themselves, their destinies are fixed. The talented, the zealous, and unscrupulous are awarded the highest destinies. They attend in the courts of kings, and wield the consciences of prinees. The subtle and the wily take their place behind the scenes, and themselves, unseen, are known only by their influences. The learned and devout are placed in the chairs of universities, and the libraries of the great. The talentless and the dull are consigned to the subordinate positions of menials in their colleges, or as brothers in their convents. The religious and devoted are sent as missionaries to distant lands, to exercise those feelings which would interfere with the unscrupulousness required of them nearer home ; while if there be reason to suspect the fidelity of any one—to fear treachery or desertion from the order—if there be the least shadow of suspicion that the intima penetralia of the system may be laid open by the unfaithfulness of any member, then the suspected one is suddenly removed and is never heard of more, unless as some missionary in far distant lands. He is in fact banished to some region, where he is incapable of doing injury to the order ; where he is fully engaged, and from whence he has no possibility of escape.

It is no small praise to this remarkable order, that the character of its members is in high esteem for morality. It is true that according to our English notions of clerical propriety—of conventional austerity and monkish holiness, we should expect no less from a religious order. But these matters bear a very different complexion in the climate of Italy, and especially in Rome. There is nothing on which the Christian pilgrim of England will find such real disappointment, as in the oft-told and fondly-believed austerities of the monastic life. On asking one monk whether he ever prayed to a miraculous Image of the Virgin of which we were conversing, he replied with the utmost seriousness, that it was not a favourite with him, and that he never felt moved to pray to it, as it was so very ugly ! This gentleman was perfectly serious, and was a very devout religionist, of a very strict order. But the moral character of the Jesuits at Rome is unimpeached. “ We have been charged,” said one of them to me, “ with many things, —we have been charged with being crafty intriguers—with intermeddling in polities—with swaying princes—with disturbing kingdoms—with embroiling families. We have been charged with everything but one. No man has ever charged us with personal immorality ! ” This boast is certainly true as respects the Jesuits of Rome, and so true, that whereas all men in that city hesitate not to denounce the other monkish orders as idle, debauched, licentious, they never breathe a whisper against the personal morality of the Jesuits. One circumstance greatly assists this. No

Jesuit is permitted to leave the establishment alone. He must always be in company with a second Jesuit, thus having a spy on his actions and his words, as well as a safeguard against those opportunities and occasions for sin to which he might be exposed when alone. The General himself is the only exception to this rule. Even when visiting a private friend, or when ministerially engaged, the Jesuit must appear with his companion, so that in my own residence, where I often had the pleasure of receiving visits from the members of the order, I never knew an instance of one coming without his companion ; and the reason assigned was the regulation I have stated. This arrangement goes far to protect their character from all imputation and scandal, though it is said also to have other advantages ; for by the Jesuits always appearing in their peculiar costume, and in couples, the public are thrown off their guard, in case the General should have an object in sending one in ordinary attire, and unaccompanied, on any special occasion. It would completely disarm suspicion, and the object might be effected and yet the order never appear in it.

I look on the order of the Jesuits as a grand conspiracy, conducted by the greatest talent, managed with the profoundest secrecy, and carried out by the ablest agency —a grand conspiracy to bring the nations under the ecclesiastical empire of Papal Rome. The dome of St. Peter's is to their imagining as the vault of heaven, and the empire of the Papacy is to their yearnings as the sceptre of the Godhead. They aspire to realize the millennial vision of the Messiah, in the person of the Vicar of Christ enthroned in the seat of empire, in a renovated Rome, receiving the homage and reverence of all the nations of the earth. And to accomplish this vision of heaven, they employ the agency of hell. And yet there is much to approve and to admire. At all events there is much that lays hold on the mind, in the first young movement of religion in the heart. All is directed to superinduce a frame of humility—to bring down the mind from its high aspirations, to think lowly of self, and to regard every movement of conscience as a rebellious feeling that must be humbled, till the heart and intellect are placed in complete subjection, in a sort of simple, childlike submission to the authority of others. There is much in all this to captivate a pious mind—a mind conscious of its sins—doubtful of its own powers—a mind prostrated by some heavy affliction—a mind in all its first love of religion making a virtue of total submissiveness. When the mind has for a few years been brought into this state, then there will be no difficulty in the transition to the great secret and mystery of the order—the duty of an implicit and unquestioning obedience. This is the actual state—the living and breathing existence of the great body of the Jesuits. It is out of that large and numerous body that the chosen few are selected, each according to the work to be accomplished. And among so many, humble and submissive, there is never a difficulty in finding the fitting tools for any work. And then the prospect! The unscrupulous Jesuit has before him a career which the world cannot parallel, a career in which he can evoke the whole powers of the most powerful order in the world. Meanwhile, the conscientious and scrupulous sinks into the despised menial of some distant convent, or becomes a tutor in some college, or he is banished as a missionary among savages ; or—he vanishes from the sight !

The following is an extract from the bull of Clement XIV. (July 21st, 1773) for the suppression of the order.

‘ We have seen with grief of our heart that neither these remedies nor an infinity of others, since employed, have produced their due effects, or silenced the accusations and complaints against the said society. Our predecessors, Urban VII., Clement IX., &c., &c., employed, without effect, all their efforts to the same purpose. In vain did they endeavour by salutary constitutions, to restore peace to the church, as well with respect to secular affairs, with which the company ought not to have interfered, as with regard to the missions, which gave rise to great disputes and oppositions on the part of the company with the ordinaries, with other religious orders, about the holy places and communities of all sorts in Europe, Africa and America, to the great loss of souls and great scandal of the people. As likewise concerning the meaning and practice of certain idolatrous ceremonies, adopted in certain places in contempt of those justly approved by the Catholic Church. And further concerning the use and exposition of certain maxims, which the Holy See has with reason proscribed, as scandalous and manifestly contrary to good morals : and lastly, concerning other matters of great importance and prime necessity, towards preserving the integrity and purity of the doctrines of the gospel, from which maxims have resulted very great inconveniences, and great detriment both in our days and in past ages, such as the revolts and intestine troubles in some of the cathedral states, persecutions against the church, &c. * * * * *

‘ After so many storms, troubles, divisions, every good man looked forward with impatience to the happy day, which was to restore peace and tranquillity. But under the reign of Clement XIII., the times became more difficult and tempestuous, complaints and quarrels were multiplied on every side, in some places dangerous seditions arose, tumults, discord, dissensions, scandals, which, weakening or entirely breaking the bands of Christian charity, excited the faithful to all the rage of party hatreds and enmities. Desolation and danger grew to such a height, that the very sovereigns, whose piety and liberality towards the company were so well known as to be looked on as hereditary in their families,—we mean our dearly-beloved sons in Christ, the kings of France, Spain, Portugal, and Sicily—found themselves reduced to the necessity of expelling and driving from their states, kingdoms, and provinces, these very companions of Jesus, persuaded that there remained no other remedy to so great evils, and that this step was necessary in order to prevent the Christians from rising one against another ; and from massacring each other in the very bosom of our common mother, the Holy Church.

‘ Actuated by so many and important considerations, * * * after a mature deliberation, we do, out of our certain knowledge, and the fulness of our apostolice power, suppress and abolish the said company : we deprive it of all activity whatever,—of its houses, schools, colleges, hospitals, lands, and in short every other place belonging to the said company in any manner whatever, in whatsoever kingdom or province they may be situated. We abrogate and annul its statutes, rules, customs, decrees, and constitutions, even though confirmed by oath and approved by the Holy See, or otherwise ; we declare all and every kind of authority, the General, the Provincial, the Visitor, and other superiors of the said society, to be annulled and abolished for ever, of whatsoever nature the said authority may be, as well in things spiritual as temporal, &c.'

' The catholic world demands, with unanimous voice, the re-establishment of the company of Jesus. We should deem ourselves guilty of a great crime against God, if amidst these dangers of the Christian republic, we neglected the aids which the special providence of God has placed at our disposal ; and if, placed in the bark of Peter, tossed and assailed by continual storms, we refused to employ the vigorous and experienced rowers, who volunteer their services, in order to break the waves of the sea which threatens every moment shipwreck and death. Decided by motives so numerous and powerful, we have resolved to do now what we could have wished to have done at the commencement of our pontificate. We therefore concede and grant, &c. &c.'

' We ordain that the present letters be inviolably observed according to their form and tenor in all time coming—that they enjoy their full and entire effect—that they shall never be submitted to the judgment or revision of any judge, with whatever power he may be clothed, declaring null and of no effect, any encroachment on the present regulations ; and this, notwithstanding any apostolic constitutions and ordinances, especially the brief of Clement XIV., of happy memory.'

THE foregoing account of the Jesuits formed originally a chapter of my former work,—“A PILGRIMAGE TO ROME;” and is inserted here as a suitable introduction to these conversations with some members of the Order. Whatever may be its defects, it was forwarded to Rome, and the Jesuit who communicated so much and so interesting information on a subject little known, and less understood in this country, has recognised my narrative of our conversation, and avowing himself as my informant, undertakes to correct my mistakes as to his meaning, and to rescue his order from the suspicions and the odium entailed upon it through my supposed misrepresentation.

The following is his statement ;—

“ In this chapter Mr. Seymour has represented, or misrepresented, a rather long conversation which I had with him on the Society of Jesus, in the presence of Mrs. Seymour and a friend. It was not enthusiasm for my order which prompted me to speak at large on this subject, but a real wish I had to inculcate upon them the great value of two virtues, so little known to Protestant minds, that is, humility and obedience; and to make them understand how in the Catholic religion the love of Christ and the desire of imitating Him may induce so many men to sacrifice all for his sake, and embrace a life of self-denial. I spoke really with warmth, because I did aim at being impressive. I declared at first, how humility and obedience had been recommended by our Lord both by his example and doctrines. I shewed how our Society was founded on both these virtues; how we are trained to them by our Constitutions, and how the Exercises of St. Ignatius chiefly conduce to that end. I insisted on the fact, that our obedience was not paid to man and for man, but to Christ Himself, and for Christ's sake: that we aimed at a full indifference about places, employments, and conveniences, in order to attain, through holy obedience, to our end, which is the salvation and sanctification of ourselves and our neighbours,

“They were most silent and attentive to my speech, nor did I hear, as far as I remember, a word of disgust and disapproval on their side. Now let us come to Mr. Seymour's narrative. He states that he could very easily, in my excitement and enthusiasm for the order, bring me by successive enquiries to the plain declaration that, according to our rules, we feel obliged to obey our superiors, even then when the order might be against our religious convictions, our moral feelings, and conscientious scruples: in a word, when there would be a real SIN. This is, I must say, a plain falsehood. I don't remember that he addressed to me any query of such a kind, but if he had, how could I have replied in the way he pretends, since in our Constitutions we are more than once expressly taught and directed, that we ought to obey in all things wherein no SIN is to be found? “in omnibus ubi peccatum non cerneretur.” (Summarium Constitutionem, No. 31.) This very same charge against our Society had been made some thirteen years ago, brought forth by Ranke in his History of the Papacy; and a refutation of it, through the original passages of our Constitutions, was inserted in the Roman periodical, Gli Annali delle Scienze Religiose, of which I was a collaborateur. How, then, could I have so lost my wits as to express such an opinion as Mr. Seymour attributes to me?

“Again, he says that, according to my confessions, a Jesuit must be prepared, and may expect, to be sent by his superior as a messenger, or a servant, or a footman, to act as a spy in some important family, or as a private secretary or minister of a prince in Germany. When speaking of our indifference to all offices, I alluded of course to such offices as are within the range of our Institute, and connected with our religious vocation. But the offices mentioned by Mr. Seymour were never heard of in the Society, and are mere fancies of his own brains.

“ Further, I may have said that when we are ordered to do something, or employed in any office by holy obedience, after having done our best to fulfil it well, we are not accountable to God for the success. But Mr. Seymour has so misconstrued my meaning, as to state, ‘ that in all the sayings and actions of the members, they are saying and acting in obedience to authority ; and that in almost everything in which individual Jesuits are the objects of praise or censure, they deserve neither the one nor the other, the praise and the censure belonging properly to the General and council of the Order, and not to the individual Jesuit’—as though the Jesuits were quite stripped of every personal merit or demerit, and their personal actions and exertions were of no account. A pure nonsense ! I really spoke of the manner in which every one in our Society is as far as possible directed to cultivate and foster those natural abilities, energies, and dispositions, which are discovered in each ; a proof, truly, that the Society proceeds towards her subjects with wisdom and motherly care, not with a despotic sway. But Mr. Seymour comments on it, by mentioning that even political intrigue is fostered by the General in those who show a taste and aptitude for it. He should be aware that by our Constitutions we are most strictly forbidden to meddle with politics at all. Upon the whole, he describes us (and always appealing to my statements) as the mere tools of the General and his council for any even dark design and crime. I would have referred him to the very excellent pamphlet of F. Ravignan, De l'Existence et de l'Institute des Jésuits, chiefly in chapters 4 and 5, on obedience, and on the government of the Society. Mr. Seymour, who speaks of the Society as a great conspiracy to bring the nations under the ecclesiastical empire of papal Rome, must learn to understand that the Society has only one great object, that of saving souls, of winning souls to Christ, and consequently to the true Church of Christ, but by those means only which Christ has recommended, and the Apostles and apostolic men have employed. There is no dark design, no mischievous engine in her. The book of the Exercises, which is really her most powerful weapon, has been translated and circulated in England; it has been tried by the Anglicans themselves; so all is in the full light of day. But the ignorance of Mr. Seymour about the Order of which he speaks so confidently is capital."

The principal point in all this is, the attempted vindication of the members of the Order from the charge of paying to the superior an obedience too submissive—even to the extent of obeying a command contrary to the religious, moral, and conscientious scruples or convictions of the individual—a command that may involve a sin.

This is not precisely my statement. That which I stated, as detailed to me by Padre Mazio, was, that when a command was given which seemed to the individual member to require him to perform some action which was opposed to his feelings, his scruples, his conscience, and which seemed even to be sinful, he was so trained by the moral system of the Order, that he at once persuaded himself that he ought not to suppose that his superior would issue a command that was sinful—that he ought modestly rather to assume, that he himself erred in his view of the character of the action—that humility required of him to think his own judgment probably wrong, and the judgment of his superior more weighty and right—and that thus, by humbly waiving his own opinion, as to the sinfulness of the action, by implicitly deferring to the more weighty judgment of the superior who issued the command, he satisfied his own conscience, obviated his own scruples, and ceasing to regard it as sinful, he thought it his duty no longer to question or to doubt, but implicitly to obey. My charge, as derived from the statement of my informant, was,—not that the Jesuit would obey a command to sin, thinking it to be a sin, but that he was trained to doubt his own opinion, to waive his own judgment, to think it his duty and his merit to surrender his own convictions, and thus to obey a command which he had otherwise regarded as sinful. In deference to the judgment of the superior, it was now to be regarded as lawful.

Padre Mazio refers to two authorities, as embodying the true principles of the Order on this point, namely, "The Exercises of St. Ignatius," and "The Constitutions of the Society of Jesus." A reference to these authorities will enable all persons to judge of the accuracy or inaccuracy of my views.

The following is in "the Constitutions."

"That holy obedience may be perfect in us in every point, in execution, in will, in intellect, doing whatever is enjoined us with all celerity, with spiritual joy and perseverance, persuading ourselves that all is right, suppressing every repugnant thought of our own, in a sure obedience, and that moreover in all things which are determined by the Superior, wherein it cannot be defined, as is said, any kind of sin appears. And let every one persuade himself, that they who live under obedience, should permit themselves to be moved and directed under Providence by their Superiors, just as if they were a corpse (ac si eadaver essent,) which allows itself to be moved and handled in any way, or as the staff of an aged man (atque senis baculus) which serves him wherever and in whatever thing he, who holds it in his hand, pleases to use it. Thus obedient, he should execute anything on which the Superior chooses to employ him in the service of the whole body of the Society, with cheerfulness of mind, and altogether believe that he will answer the divine will better in that way than in any other which he can follow in compliance with his own will and differing judgment."

In all this it is required that the individual Jesuit shall present himself as a corpse, and as a staff. The members are to have no will, no feeling, no conscience of their own. They must passively and mechanically obey the will, the feeling, the conscience of those who use them. They do not think, but only perform. The individual Jesuit is thus required to become as a passive thing—a mere machine in the hands of his superiors. And in case there might seem something sinful in the command—something wrong—something repugnant to his secret thought and private judgment, he is expressly enjoined to “persuade himself that ALL IS RIGHT, suppressing every repugnant thought and judgment”—not indeed doing that which he sees and thinks to be sinful, but stifling his scruples and “persuading himself that ALL IS RIGHT.”

“In order that we may altogether be of the same mind, and in conformity with the Church herself, if she shall have defined any thing to be BLACK, which to our eyes appear to be WHITE, we ought in the same way to pronounce it to be BLACK.—[Autograph.]—That we may in all things attain to the truth, that we may not err in anything, we ought ever to hold it as a FIXED PRINCIPLE that what I see to be WHITE I shall believe it to be BLACK, if the Hierarchical Church define it so to be.”

There is THE FIXED PRINCIPLE of the Jesuits as set forth in the very authority to which Padre Mazio twice refers us, the authorized exposition of the moral principles of the Order! It is the thirteenth rule of the eighteen rules established by Ignatius Loyola, for promoting uniformity with the mind of the Church. It must be acknowledged as sufficiently definite, illustrating how a command, which seems to be black or sinful in the eyes of an individual, is to be regarded as white or sinless when it comes from the superior authority.

The other particulars referred to by Padre Mazio seem scarcely to require so much as an explanation. He says that his object in alluding to the virtues of humility and obedience was simply to impress their value upon us as being virtues little known among Protestants! He seemed to me rather to have dwelt on them with a view to illustrate the great piety, the humble obedient spirit of the Order of Jesuits; and I am still of the same opinion, as I have a very perfect recollection of the circumstances under which his observations were introduced. And as to what is stated respecting the liability of a Jesuit being appointed as a spy in a private family,—as a footman in one and a secretary in another, as a minister of state in one country and the confessor in the Royal Closet of another, it is apparent that all this was no more than my own inference, from the statement of my informant, and was certainly never ascribed to him. And finally where he informs us that all Jesuits are forbidden by the constitutions of the Order to meddle in politics, he might have written more to the purpose, if he had informed us why the whole world has denounced them as a Society of political and religious intriguers. The Bull of Pope Clement XIV. sets forth that—“ Our dearly beloved sons in Christ, the Kings of France, Spain, Portugal, and Sicily found themselves reduced to the necessity of expelling and driving from their states the Company of Jesus, being persuaded that there remained no other remedy to so great evils, and that this step was necessary in order to prevent the Christians from rising one against another, and from massacring each other in the very bosom of our common Mother, the Holy Church.” Such was the formal judgment of the Court of Rome, and after such an authority as to the intensity of their factions and intrigues, it is too much to tell us that they never meddle in polities. At least we must not be expected to believe it.

CHAPTER II.

AN ORDINATION—A VISIT TO THE JESUITS—EXPLANATION OF MY VIEWS—THE LAYING ON OF HANDS—THE PRIESTLY POWER OF ABSOLUTION AND OF SACRIFICE—THE RELIGIOUS MOVEMENT AT OXFORD—THE RELIGIOUS MOVEMENT IN GERMANY—THE NATURE OF THE ABSOLVING POWER—WHETHER JUDICIAL OR DECLARATORY—THE OPINIONS OF THE TWO CHURCHES COMPARED.

I now commence my narrative of the conversations which took place, between myself and certain members of this celebrated Order.

The day was far advanced, when the hour appointed for the visit of the Jesuits had arrived. The morning had been occupied by me in attendance at the great Church, or Basilica of S. Giovanni di Laterano. It is the Senior Basilica of Rome, taking precedence even of St. Peter's itself. The object of my attendance there was to witness the form of ordination. Ninety-two young men were that morning ordained, admitted into the various orders of the Church of Rome. They are seven in number, and I was glad of the opportunity of witnessing the ceremonial; and certainly it was a deeply interesting sight; for however I might dissent from the system of the Church, and however strongly I might feel indignant at what might seem to be superstitious or unscriptural, it yet could not fail to be a touching and beautiful sight, to witness the self-devotion and vowed consecration of ninety-two men, in the flower and vigor of early manhood, to the service of God. As the several candidates for the various orders performed the prescribed ceremonials, according to the rules of the Pontifical,—as I held the Pontifical in my hand and carefully followed every step in its performance,—as I saw some standing, some kneeling, and some prostrate with face on the earth,—as I observed some receiving one order and some another, in different yet regulated forms,—as I saw the laying on of hands, the tonsure, the giving the chalice, the unfolding the chasuble, the tying the hands, the anointing the fingers, the washing, the communion, I could not but feel that the formalities were very puerile, but I felt still more my heart stirring within me in prayer, that the Holy Ghost might indeed descend from above, and make them faithful and fearless in preaching the everlasting gospel of Christ. It was the Cardinal-Vicar who conferred the orders.

I had returned home after this spectacle, and was looking over the Pontifical, examining a point which had much impressed me, when two visitors were announced. They were two Jesuits. They came in the peculiar costume of the order. One was a Priest, and the other a Lay-Brother, but according to the rule of the order, as observed at Rome, they were robed alike, the whole body, from the Padre-Generale himself, to the lowliest Lay-Brother who is porter at the gate, being dressed in costume precisely the same. It consists of a black cassock, extending from the throat to the ankles, without any ornament beyond a little brass medal and chain, appended to the waist. The cravat is white, but so narrow as to be scarcely observable above the cassock, and over all is a black cloak, neat, plain and without sleeves. The hat is remarkable for the great breadth of its leaf. It is not red like those of the Cardinals, nor white like those of the Camaldolines, nor decorated with rosettes and bands of orange, green, &c., like those of the Prelates, all which seem so strange to our English tastes. It is black and turned up slightly at the sides, without any bow or other ornament. The costume as a whole is neat and seemly, and as elegant and becoming as any ecclesiastical or academic costume can be. It certainly surpasses in this particular, the style and appearance of the other monastic or religious orders; for it bears the stamp of studied neatness and propriety, while that of some of the other orders is exquisitely grotesque and ridiculous.

In a few moments we all were as much at ease, as the peculiar object and nature of the visit could permit. The interchange of mutual courtesies, and some words upon general subjects, soon led to the object of our meeting.

The reverend Padre opened it, by saying that he had been directed to wait on me in consequence of my desire for information as to some particulars in the Church of Rome,—that he was informed that I was an Anglican clergyman, who was wishing to withdraw from the Church of England, and to hold communion with the Catholic Church; and that he came to assist me, as far as lay in his power, in carrying out my desire. And he concluded by asking me in an earnest manner and in an under voice, whether there was anything particular which I wished to communicate.

I did not choose to notice this sotto voce communication, but I said at once that there must be some mistake ; that some one must have misinformed him ; for that I was an attached member of the Church of England,—that I had as one of her clergy held preferment in her, but had resigned my appointment,—that I was perfectly independent in my circumstances and my feelings, that I had always been warmly opposed to the Church of Rome, as well as sincerely attached to the Church of England ; and that I had now visited Rome, with a desire to see and judge all things for myself, to change, modify, or confirm my former opinions, after a free and fair examination of everything to which I might be so fortunate as to obtain access.

He stated at once and with extreme courtesy, the pleasure he should feel in facilitating my object, and expressed his readiness to give me all the information in his power. But that he did not see why I should be unwilling to join the communion of his Church ; since it was allowed by all parties that there was a true Church at Rome, and that there was no other than one, and therefore he thought that, as an Anglican clergyman, I might not be unwilling to do as did some others,—namely, while at Rome, join in the communion of that church.

I replied that, whether rightly or wrongly founded, I felt great and strong prejudices against the Church of Rome,—that all my feelings and experience were against her ; and that I felt so many objections and difficulties in the way of communicating with her, that there was much to be answered and removed before I could give him any hope of my joining her ; but that I was fully prepared to hear all that might be said in her defence, and that I believed myself sufficiently open to conviction, and sufficiently candid to acknowledge it, if convinced, and sufficiently fearless to act on it.

He questioned me as to the nature of my difficulties, and suggested naturally to me that I should state my objections, that he might have the opportunity of removing them.

I could not but acquiesce in this. It was precisely the position in which I desired to be placed. But I felt that my commencement must be with extreme caution, lest I should awaken suspicion and elicit actual opposition. I wished to be an enquirer, rather than a controvertist; and I was led to begin with a point that exactly suited my object with a man, who imagined me to be one of those, who under the name of Anglican clergy, have all their ideas and feelings, all their minds and hearts with the Roman Church. The Roman Pontifical was in my hands at the moment.

I told him, that I had attended at the ordination that morning at S. Giovanni di Laterano,—that I had observed what was to my mind a most remarkable omission, namely, the omission of the “laying on of hands,” as the act of ordination;—that, although there was at an early part of the ceremonial a laying on of hands, yet it was only for the purpose of designation, and not of ordination;—as designating the person to be afterwards ordained, and not as the act of ordination itself,—that the candidates for orders were called ordinandi even after laying on of hands, shewing that they were not regarded as ordained by that act, but only set apart to be afterwards ordained, and that they were not called ordinati until the chalice was given to them, with the words “accipe protestatem, &c.” “receive power to offer the sacrifice of the mass for the living and the dead." I said that this shewed that, in the Church of Rome, orders were conferred, not by laying on of hands with prayer, but by the delivering of the chalice, &c. ; whereas, if, as some suppose in England, the virtue of orders in the apostolic succession can only pass through the hands of the ordaining bishop, there can be none such in the Church of Rome. In her the virtue or grace of the apostolic succession passes through the chalice, and not through the laying on of the hands of the bishop.

He replied by saying that the ordination was a continuous act, one that commenced with the laying on of hands, and ended with the delivering of the chalice,—that though the former was for designation, and the latter for ordination, yet with the former was connected the power of absolution, and with the latter that of sacrificing,—that by the former was conferred the power of absolving sins, and by the latter that of offering the sacrifice of the mass. He argued thus that it was to be regarded as one act.

After some further conversation on this point he went on to say, that there were two distinct powers conferred upon a Priest. One being inherent in his priesthood and inherent in every priest,—a power over the literal and natural body of our Lord, that is, the power of transubstantiation ; the other being null and void unless with the sanction of the bishop ; not inherent in his priesthood, but ceded to the priest by the bishop, that is, the power over his mystical or spiritual body, in other words—the power of absolution.

I said that I was to infer from this that a priest could celebrate mass, that is, could transubstantiate the bread and wine into Christ, and offer him for the sins of the living and the dead without the sanction of the bishop, but that he could not absolve the sins of his people without that episcopal sanction.

He replied that this was precisely the case: that he could celebrate mass without the bishop, but could not absolve from sins without the bishop; that the former power was inherent in his priesthood, the latter not.

I felt that he had placed himself in a difficult position by this statement; so I remarked,—If a priest has no power to pronounce absolution, without the bishop's licence; and yet can say mass without it, then there can be no efficacy in the absolution which he reads, and which the canon of the mass requires him to read. Assuredly if he can celebrate mass of his inherent power, he can give absolution of his inherent power; for that absolution is part of the mass, and is therefore involved in it.

His answer to this was very remarkable. He had no way of escape but one, and that one he did not hesitate to adopt. He said that the absolution involved in the mass is of no value or efficacy,—that it is only a general absolution of persons of whose sins the priest knows nothing, and of whose repentance he knows nothing, and therefore it is of no efficacy or value, and has no effect; for, he continued, if the persons have repented, then God has already forgiven them, and if they have not repented, then this absolution in the mass cannot help them.

I was conscious of the advantage which I might derive from this statement, and I therefore took care to dwell on it and to reiterate it, that it might become an assumed point, an admitted principle between us to be employed in our after-argument. I waited patiently till our conversation should take such a turn, that I might avail myself effectively of so important an admission.

The conversation immediately took another direction. He asked me respecting the movement at Oxford ; remarking that the Anglican Church was now in a most interesting state,—that it was giving great promise of many and of better things,—that the late or present religious movement within her, was now interesting all Rome, and Europe, and the whole world. And he concluded by asking me my opinion of the movement.

This was the very last question which I wished to answer. I felt it might oblige me to avow my opinions sooner as well as more strongly than I desired. I feared the question might have been proposed with the view to test me,—to ascertain my party ; and thus to determine the course he should pursue. I knew that if I at once avowed myself a decided antagonist, he would withdraw from all further intercourse with me.

I therefore answered his enquiry by saying, that I had been careful to read all the “Tracts for the Times,” which were the profession of faith with those, among whom the movement originated,—that I did not agree with many of their statements and principles ; and that I thought that my reverend friend was mistaken as to their probable effect on the mind of the people of England,—an effect of the very opposite character from that which seemed to be the intention of those who originated it.

He asked me, whether I did not think that they tended to create a similarity or union of the Anglican Church with the Roman Church.

I replied that such seemed to be the intention of the parties. They seemed yearning for a union with Rome, but that I apprehended a very different and opposite result; —that their proceedings would evoke, and indeed had already evoked, an antagonist spirit, which would be altogether too powerful for them, and I feared would do incalculable mischief to the Church.

He said he was aware that the Anglican Bishops in general had set themselves against the movement, but he seemed to treat their interference very lightly. He then begged of me to explain my idea of the manner in which the movement was likely to operate.

I answered, that the Anglican Church stood between two systems,—between Romanism and Dissent. These were the two extremes, to one or other of which all who loved extremes were likely to precipitate themselves. The party of the movement desired to draw her nearer and nearer to Rome,—to give her more and more a similarity to the Church of Rome; and by that very course had led their opponents to run into the opposite extreme. It had evoked an antagonist spirit, that was sure to lead nearer and nearer to Dissent: and I added that my own conviction was, that the real evil, the impending danger was, the people forsaking the Church of England, as a Church declining towards Rome; and then utterly overthrowing and destroying her,—a danger like that which arose out of the proceedings of Archbishop Laud, in the time of Charles I.; namely, the utter subversion of the Church of England.

He intimated that he had not seen the movement in that light, but rather regarded it as one likely to lead the Church of England towards the Church of Rome,—that all parties of all Churches seemed agreed, that the movement could not stop where it was,— that the active movers would come over, and if honest in their statements, and sincere in their opinions, must come over—to the Church of Rome ; and that so far at least the Church of Rome must be a gainer ; —that however it might end for the Church of England, it must prove a gain to the Church of Rome,—that they could not remain as they were, but must go further ; and he felt that the course taken by such good men was certain to exert a great weight and influence upon others.

I was silent, except so far as assenting to his opinion respecting the parties engaged in the movement. He observed this, and continued to say, that there was a large section of the Church of England,—and that too an increasing section,—steadily and surely inclining to the Church of Rome ; that thus a great division existed in the very heart of the Church of England, and that thus there were many, who would embrace, and were embracing the very system against which I objected ; and he added that although I might not be aware of the fact, yet he knew it from sources of information that were not accessible to all, that multitudes in England were privately coming over to the Church of Rome.

On my remarking in reply, that his statement was very probable, and that the members of his order, the order of Jesuits, were likely to have very accurate information, he said that the existence of such a division in the Church of England, was a strong argument against my remaining in her, and that the multitude of good men leaving her and entering the Church of Rome, was a further argument for my forsaking the one Church, and embracing the other,— in short that it formed a strong objection to remaining in the Church of England.

I said, in as quiet a tone as I could command, as if indifferent to the result of my words, that I did not see how his statement as to the facts, whether true or untrue, could affect the principle of the question,—that I thought the argument derived from the existence of a division or counter-movement in a Church, was an argument that cut both ways; that at that moment there was a division and movement in the Church of Rome, arising out of the exhibition of the Holy Coat at Trêves; * and that several of the priesthood were the leaders of the movement,—that these parties were calling for a change or reformation in several particulars,—that they were demanding that the sacramental cup should be given to the laity,—that some of them were actually administering it,—that they were celebrating their services in the vernacular tongue,—that they were calling for a rescinding of the laws on the celibacy of the priesthood,—that this movement occurring in Germany, was quite as marked in the Church of Rome, as the movement at Oxford in the Church of England; and therefore, I added, the movement in Germany was as cogent an objection to the Church of Rome, as the movement at Oxford was to the Church of England.

He flushed and fired at this statement, declaring that the movement in Germany was nothing,—that they were only a set of rebels,—that they were merely a few rebellious priests who would soon be brought down. They were

I said that he seemed mistaken,—that as the papal government excluded “the Times,” and other English, German, and French papers, describing the movement, not permitting the facts to be made known at Rome, it was possible he was not aware of the extent and importance of the movement,—that they circulated only those papers which were hostile to the movement, and that thus I apprehended he might be deceiving himself, as to the extent and importance of the movement, which had already succeeded to a considerable extent.

My reverend friend was thoroughly upset and irritated by this turn of the conversation, and I was glad to let it pass to other topics, even though connected with the movement at Oxford. He observed that he thought the Church of England very inconsistent towards these men and towards herself,—that she admitted the ancient and Catholic sacrament of penance ; that is, as he explained it, she recognised the power of absolution, but that she did not exercise it,—that she went so far as to confer that power on her priests, but expelled them for exercising it,—that the Lutheran and the Reformed Churches had rejected the thing altogether ; and were therefore consistent, but that the Anglican Church admitted and recognised the thing,—conferred the power on her Priests,—but did not exercise it, and was inconsistent.

I said that I thought he did wrong to the Anglican Church ; that she recognised and held a certain power,—that she conferred this power on her ministers,—that those ministers exercised that power, and were not, as he supposed, expelled for it,—that it was their duty and constant practice to exercise all, neither more nor less, that the Church designed to confer on them. I then added, that I feared he had misunderstood her formularies,—that she confers only a power to declare or pronounce authoritatively God's absolution and forgiveness of sins ; and that all her ministers exercise, and cannot help in her daily services exercising this power, which is all the Church confers on them ; and that therefore she is thus far consistent. But as she does not pretend to confer a judicial power to judge the sinner and absolve the sin, as in the Church of Rome, so her ministers do not pretend to exercise that, and thus there is no inconsistency.

His rejoinder to this was that our Lord conferred two powers, one to "bind," and the other to "loose ;" and that as the bishops of the Anglican Church exercised the power of excommunication, they therein exercised the power to "bind" the sin upon the sinner, but never exercised the power of "loosing" by absolution, taking away the sin. And that this was a great inconsistency.

I answered that, by our laws, if a bishop excommunicated a person for any canonical fault, he must take off that excommunication, and again receive him, on his open repentance,—that if he thus exercises one power, he must under these circumstances exercise the other, and that thus if the excommunicating and restoring power of a bishop, peculiar as it was to the bishop, and not to the priest, was the power to "bind," and "loose," then both were exercised among us, and there was no inconsistency. I then added that if his views were carried out, it would imply that the power to "bind," and "loose," belonged only to the bishops, and not to priests.

He avoided noticing this, and reiterated his statement in another form, saying that we ought to sit as judges on the sinner, and exercise a judicial power over him ; either binding the sin on the sinner, or loosing him from his sin ; and thus placing him sinless before God in order to his salvation.

I said that his words implied or seemed to convey an idea, for which I was scarcely prepared, and therefore I asked,—if the “loosing” the sinner from his sin makes him sinless before God and so secures his salvation,—would not the “binding” his sin upon the sinner keep him sinful before God, and so ensure his damnation? I added that the one must be co-extensive with the other, and this would be placing the damnation, as well as the salvation of the man, in the hands of the priest.

He avoided this, and, as if he had never heard me, turned away to other subjects of a more general nature. I felt very unwilling to keep him to the point, lest by doing so he might be led to regard me as a controversialist, prepared to dispute with him ; rather than as an Anglican clergyman in a friendly conversation, seeking for information.

It was not long before we returned to the judicial power of the priest. In reference to this he said, that the priest was a judge to give or withhold forgiveness, to bind or loose the sin as he judges best. He must form his judgment to the best of his power, and bind or loose accordingly ; and then God confirms and fulfils that judgment, binding in Hell, or loosing in Heaven, according as the priest, who was his judge and reconciler, should adjudge.

I asked whether,—seeing that the priest was but a man, and therefore liable to an error in judgment,—his judgment was always and certainly confirmed and fulfilled by God, damning or saving, according as the priest bound or loosed on earth. I added that my question had special reference to such a supposed case, as the priest making an error in judgment ; as in that case, although in error, it would seem that he had unlimited power for saving or damning, if his judgment on earth was always confirmed in heaven.

He replied, that of course where the priest, as judge, erred in his judgment, as to the repentance of the sinner, and the absolution of the sin, his judgment was not affirmed by God,—that in that case, though he bound on earth, yet it was not bound in heaven ; and though he loosed on earth, it was not loosed in heaven,

I said I wished to understand this point clearly, and begged he would correct me if I was wrong, in inferring that if the priest judged erroneously, as to the repentance or non-repentance of the sinner ; and if he acted on that erroneous judgment, in binding or loosing the sinner, it would then be of no avail. I asked especially whether in such a case, the absolution of this judge, sitting and judging judicially, was of any value.

He answered emphatically that it was “ void.”

I felt that now the argument was in my hands, and my mind turned in secret to Him who alone could still my nervous throbings and excitement ; and enable me to speak with calmness and accuracy ; for, at times, when I considered that I was dealing with men on whom I had always learned to look as the most subtle controversialists, I feared the truth might fail through my inability to cope with them.

rather had laid down two things, which seemed to me all-important on this point. In the first place he had freely stated, that if the sinner had not repented, then the absolution of the priest, however pronounced, was "void." In the second place he had frankly stated, at the commencement of our conversation respecting the absolution in the mass, that if the sinner had indeed repented, then the absolution was useless, inasmuch as he was already absolved by God ; and having on repentance received forgiveness from God himself, he did not need the absolution of man. It would be reversing the words, and reading, not "whatsoever is loosed on earth shall be loosed in heaven," but "whatsoever is loosed in heaven shall be loosed on earth." It was doing over again what had been already done by God himself. I stated that every man in England, on hearing his statements respecting the judicial power of absolving, would argue that if the sinner did repent, the absolution of man was useless, inasmuch as he had already the forgiveness of God ; and if the sinner did not repent, the absolution, on his own shewing, was void, as arising from an error of judgment in the priest. I added that this was a process of reasoning which ought to be answered, and that I should feel glad if he could supply me with an adequate answer, for if the point were placed in the form of a dilemma, I could see no way of escape. As thus :—The sinner is repentant or he is not : If he is repentant, the absolution is useless and unnecessary, as God has already forgiven him : If he is not repentant, the absolution is void, as already admitted ; and therefore under these circumstances, I could not see any advantage in the judicial power over the declaratory power.

He perfectly understood me, as I thought, but instead of endeavouring to solve the difficulty of the dilemma, he laughed at the idea of a declaratory power. He said that a power to declare and pronounce the forgiveness of sins, was not the power promised to the Church,—that power was a power or privilege, not peculiar to the Priesthood, but common to the Laity ;—that the power promised by our Lord to his Church, was a power peculiar to the office of the Priesthood ; and that therefore it could not be the power of declaring and pronouncing the forgiveness of sins, inasmuch as all men, not only Priests, but Laymen, not only men but women, can pronounce and declare that forgiveness. And therefore, he argued, the priestly power of absolving, must be not only declaratory but judicial.

I said in reply to this, that however satisfactory his statement might appear to the Italian mind, I apprehended it would prove otherwise to the mind of England,—that it was there felt that a Layman could declare God's forgiveness of sin, as well and as accurately as a Clergyman, but not so authoritatively. I said, If the sovereign of England sends a message of peace or of war, or aught else, to the sovereign of France, it is sent through a special messenger, a Herald or Ambassador, or other authorised person. Such person comes with authority. His message is declared with authority. He is not the judge to decide judicially, whether there shall be peace or war, but he is to "declare and pronounce" with authority the message of the sovereign. But any other man, even any woman, may deliver that message as well, as clearly and as accurately, but not as authoritatively. All such speak without authority. The appointed or authorised person alone speaks with authority.

In the same way God sends forth his message, through “the ministers and stewards of the Church.” They are the authorised Heralds or Ambassadors of Heaven. They go forth with authority. And though other persons may deliver the message of forgiveness of sins, as clearly and as well, yet they do so without the authority of the commissioned persons. Again, I continued to argue, if a sovereign in the exercise of his prerogative pardons a criminal, any person may tell that criminal of his coming pardon, may “declare and pronounce” his pardon ; but the criminal will not be satisfied or comforted with the words of these unauthorized persons, and he waits for the Sheriff or lawful officer, he waits for the authorized person who alone can come with authority, to “declare and pronounce” the sovereign’s pardon. And thus we arrived at two points—first, the Official does not sit himself as judge, to act judicially and confer the pardon, but only to “declare and pronounce” the forgiveness of the sovereign ; and secondly, he does it with authority, as the only authorised person ; and therefore he does it far more acceptably and satisfactorily, than can be done by any unauthorised person. This I stated was the true position of the ministers of the Church.

He seemed at a loss for a reply to this, acknowledging there certainly was a great advantage in the declaration being made by an authorised minister or official, that there was some difference between the authorised minister on one hand, and the unauthorised layman on the other, pronouncing and declaring God’s forgiveness of sins. But still he thought it an inconsistency in the Church of England, retaining the form in her liturgy, and not exercising the power in her practice ; and he felt this the more strongly as he could understand the Lutherans, the Reformed, the Dissenters, who rejected the whole doctrine ;—they rejected all pretensions to this power, and therefore were consistent in not exercising it ; but the Anglican Churches alone had retained the hierarchy, the liturgy and other elements of the Church, admitting the existence of this power of absolution, but wholly neglecting to exercise it. He added, that Christ gave to the Apostle Peter the power to bind and loose, to absolve and retain sins,—that that power was inherent in the priesthood of the Catholic Church, and that it ought to be exercised for the punishment of the sinner, and for the comfort of the penitent.

I said, that I feared he had misunderstood the nature of the power of which he spake ; and I endeavoured to explain my views of it. I commenced by stating, that the words binding and loosing, absolving and retaining, were words in use among the Jews in reference to leprosy and to lepers.

When a man was afflicted with leprosy, the priest was required under the law to declare him unclean, and therefore to shut him up or bind or retain him, thus excluding him from the congregation, lest he might infect others with his loathsome disease ; and when the man was healed, the priest pronounced him clean, and then loosed or absolved him, and permitted him again to mingle with the people. Now our Lord in using this language, referred to that which was familiar to the people. It is this that explains our Lord's words. On referring to the law of leprosy, as set forth in Leviticus xiii., the words employed in the Septuagint are of vast importance on this particular. When the man was brought to the priest and seen to be leprous, the priest was to declare or pronounce him unclean. The word is μεανεῖ, that is, the priest shall defile him,—shall unclean him: whereas the man was already defiled, or unclean; and the priest was not to give the leprosy to the man, but only to declare and pronounce that he was defiled or unclean by the disease. The priest is thus said to do that which he only declares, or pronounces is already done by God. Again, when the man is recovered, and the priest sees him cured by the hand of God, then he was to declare and pronounce him clean. The word is καθαγίει, that is, the priest shall clean him; whereas the man was already clean of his leprosy; and the priest was not to take away the disease, but only to declare and pronounce that the man was clean. The priest is thus said to do that which he only declared and pronounced to be already done by God. It is evident that the priest neither gave the disease, nor cured the disease,—neither imparted it, nor took it away. It was the Almighty who both inflicted it, and removed it; and yet in the language of Leviticus, the priest is said to do both the one and the other; and therefore it may be argued that in the language of Scripture, the priest is said himself to do that which he is only appointed to declare and pronounce to be already done in the providence of God. This language pervades the whole law of leprosy, being repeated again and again, see verses, 3, 6, 11, 13. &c. And as the Septuagint was in general use in our Lord's day, so his language, adopted from the Jewish habit or mode of speech, was clearly understood; and when he desired his Apostles to bind and loose the sinner, to forgive and retain the sin, he meant no more than that they, like the priest in the matter of leprosy, were to declare and pronounce the forgiveness of sins, using phrases perfectly intelligible to Jews, implying that God had already forgiven them. I added that as the Church of England only gave this power to her ministers, and intended no more than this in her Liturgy, her ministers dared not proceed farther. They exercised all the power they received or possessed, and therefore were not liable to the charge of inconsistency, as possessing a power, which they did not exercise.

He made no attempt to weaken this explanation of the peculiar phraseology of the Jewish law, as adopted by our Lord ; but dwelt on the comfort and advantage of allowing a judicial power to the priesthood ; and then leaving this subject altogether, he entered upon a narration of the circumstances connected with the conversion of a Lutheran minister of Germany, who had forsaken all, and coming to Rome, was graciously received by the Pope, and was led to embrace the faith and practice of the Church of Rome. He then detailed the circumstances connected with the conversion of a Protestant clergyman of America, who had come to Rome with his wife and children, and was received into the Church. He was now studying and preparing for admission into the order of the Jesuits, and also for admission to the priesthood. He had already been admitted into the inferior orders. His wife, by the kindness of his Holiness the Pope, was admitted into a nunnery ; and being musical, assists in giving musical instruction to the pupils who attend at the nunnery. She has not however as yet taken the veil, or made those vows by which she is to be for ever removed from her husband, and he may be enabled to enter into the priesthood.

My reverend friend dwelt at considerable length, and with lively interest, on the conversion of these parties. He seemed to think his narrative might have some effect, in inducing me to follow the example. But although I watched narrowly its detail, yet I could observe nothing in the way of argument or motive, that requires repetition here. I did not interrupt his narration, but he stated at the conclusion, his regret that he could not meet me again for some weeks, as he was about to enter upon what they call the "Retreat," that is, the appointed retirement in the more solitary life of a recluse. In this retirement, according to the rule of the Jesuits, he was to be engaged for some weeks, in reviewing the past, and in meditation upon God and in reflections on the state of his own soul. In this solitude he was to be occupied in examining, for what object God had sent him into this world ;—how far he had heretofore been employed in carrying out that object ;—what he had really been doing in time past for the glory of His God ; and what he would now prepare and resolve to accomplish for the future. He dwelt on all this, in a manner that shewed he wished to impress my mind with a sense of the holiness and devotion that characterised the order of the Jesuits. And after courteously expressing many regrets, that he was precluded by the rules of his order, from conferring further with me till his "retreat" was concluded, he proposed to introduce to me some other members of the order, to converse with me in the meantime, and give me any information I might require or they could impart. I thanked him warmly for the opportunity he thus afforded me of extending my acquaintance among the Roman priesthood ; and with reciprocal expressions of kindness and courtesy we parted.

The next day he again visited me, and introduced two others, who remained with me for some hours. He himself immediately retired. And thus an unexpected way was opened to an extended acquaintance with men, whom I could not otherwise have known. They introduced me kindly and courteously to their college, and presented me to all their professors of the Collegio Romano. Some of my conversations with these gentlemen shall hereafter be narrated.

NOTE ON CONFERRING ORDERS.

My argument here, as is not unusual in conversation, is not accurately expressed; yet it relates to a subject of immense importance in these times, and therefore requires to be clearly stated.

It is held by very many among us, that there can be none of the true privileges, blessings, and promises of the Church, unless there be true Orders. And it is held by such persons, that there can be no true Orders, and therefore no true Church, unless the seed of Apostolic succession of Orders be transmitted through the laying on of the hands of the Bishop and Presbyters—the Episcopate and Priesthood combined.

It is supposed by such persons that Orders, in the fulness of this perfection, exist in the Church of Rome more surely than elsewhere. It is apparent that my argument with the Jesuits at Rome impeaches this idea, and asserts that if the seed of apostolic succession be essential to the existence of a true Church, and if this seed can be transmitted only through the laying on of hands of the Episcopate and Presbytery, then there is no succession of true Orders in the Church of Rome.

As concerns the Church of England generally, it is a matter of no importance. She has plainly declared, in Art. XXXIV, "It is not necessary that traditions and ceremonies be in all places utterly one and alike, for at all times they have been divers, and may be changed according to the diversities of countries, times, and men's manners, so that nothing be ordained against God's word." According therefore to the judgment of the Church of England, there is no absolute necessity for a universal conformity in such matters, and whether in Rome or in England, each Church has a right to arrange its process of ordination.

But when it is asserted that the Church of Rome alone has true Orders, it may be well to consider whether she has any real Orders at all. My position is, that if indeed the reality of Priest's Orders depend on the transmission of the seed of apostolic succession, through the laying on of the hands of the Bishop and Presbyters, then there are no true Priest's Orders in the Church of Rome.

I argue as follows:

In the Roman Pontifical or Ordinal there is the following rubric in the form for Ordination to the office of Deacon, "Hic solus Pontifex, manum dexteram extendens, ponit super caput cuiilibet ordinando, et NULLUS ALIUS, quia non ad SACERDOTIUM, sed ad MINISTERIUM consecrantur, dicens singulis, 'Accipe Spiritum Sanctum.' " &c.

This rubric directs that the Bishop alone, "solus Pontifex," without the Presbyters, "et nullus alias," shall lay on hands. And the reason assigned is, that the Ordination is not to the Priesthood, but only to the Ministry of the Deaconate. From this I infer, not only that the laying on of the hands of the Bishop and Presbytery is necessary to the conferring of the Priesthood, but also that which is more to my purpose, that when the Bishop alone, without the Presbytery, lays on hands, it is not an Ordination to the Priesthood, but only to the Ministry. Thus far our way is clear.

We again turn to the Pontifical for the form of ordaining to the Priesthood, and there we certainly do read of a laying on of hands of the Bishop and Presbyters. But on examination it will be seen that it is with the view to designate, to point out and set apart, those who are afterwards to be ordained, and that it is not the act or medium of conferring the Priesthood—that it is the form of designation of the persons, and not the form of Ordination of Priests. It is as follows :

In all this it is apparent that the laying on of hands, in this opening of the service, is not for the purpose of conferring the Priesthood itself, but only for the purpose of designating and setting apart those who are chosen and deemed worthy of being afterwards admitted into that Priesthood. And though the Bishop proposes to the brethren to pray for the candidates, yet there is nothing that pretends to, or looks like the conferring the power of orders, of absolution, of preaching the word, or of offering sacrifice. All is designed simply for designation, and not for ordination—for designating those who are to be afterwards ordained to the Priesthood.

In reference to this, Burnet on Art. XXV, says, “ All the ancient rituals and all those that treat of them for the first seven centuries, speak of nothing as essential to Orders, but prayer and imposition of hands—but in the tenth and eleventh century a new form was brought in, of delivering the vessels in ordaining Priests, and words were joined with that, giving them power to offer sacrifice to God and to celebrate masses, and then orders were believed to be given by this rite. The delivering of the vessels looked like matter, and these words were thought the form of the Sacraments. And the prayer that was formerly used with the imposition of hands was indeed still used, but only as a part of the office. No hands were laid on when it was used. And though the form of laying on of hands was still continued, the Bishop with other Priests laying their hands on those they ordained, yet it is now a dumb ceremony, not a word of prayer being said while they lay on their hands." What is said is only a proposal to the brethren to pray for the candidates.

And besides this, the whole office is drawn up on the supposition that the Order of Priesthood is not conferred by this laying on of hands. The candidates are still styled Ordinandi, as being still to be ordained, and are never termed Ordinati till the delivery of the vessels. This is without any doubt the act of conferring the Priesthood according to the Ordinal in the Roman Pontifical. The Bishop binds, anoints, and blesses the hands of each candidate, and then places the chalice with wine and water, and afterwards the paten with a Host in the hands of each : "Pontifice singulis dicente,—accipe potestatem offerre sacrificium Deo, missasque celebrare tam pro vivis, quam pro defunctis, in nomine Domini." Here is what they call the form and the matter of the Sacrament of Orders; and when once this is accomplished, the candidate ceases to be a candidate, and becomes a Priest. Accordingly the terms of the Ordinal now become changed. The candidate in every preceding rubric is styled Ordinandus. In every subsequent rubric he is termed Ordinatus, and Sacerdos.

The Ordinal then requires the Bishop to celebrate a Mass; and in this not only are the new Priests expressly described as Ordinati Sacerdotes, but they are required to take part in the consecration, so as to effect the transubstantiation, which is only permitted to those who are fully ordained Priests. And thus it appears that the conferring the Order of Priesthood is not by the laying on of hands of the Bishop and Presbyters, but by the ceremony of the delivery of the vessels, and the authority to sacrifice.

But is there not a second laying on of hands, over and beside that for designation at the commencement? After the Mass has been offered we read : "Pontifex cum mitra sedens super faldistorium ante medium altaris, imponit ambas manus super capita singulorum coram eo genuflectentium, dicens cuilibet—Accipe Spiritum Sanctum quorum remisseris peccata, remit-tan-ter eis, et quorum retinueris, retenta sunt."

Two remarks dispose of this.

First.—It has no part in the conferring the Priesthood, as is apparent from the fact that the candidates are previously called Ordinati and Sacerdotes, and take part in the celebration of the Mass, which can only be permitted to those who have already received the Priesthood: they were ordained Priests before.

Second.—It is apparent that this laying on of hands of the Bishop alone, and as already proved by the rubric at the commencement of this note, when hands are laid on by the Bishop alone, without the hands of the Presbytery, is not an Ordination to the Priesthood, but only an admission to the Ministry.

Thus it seems clear that the first laying on of hands is not for conferring the Order of Priesthood, but only for designation, and that the second is only for admission to the Ministry,—that is, for admission to the power of absolution, when there is jurisdiction given, as they phrase it. The Order of Priesthood is conferred in the Church of Rome, not by the laying on of hands, but by the delivery of the vessels and the power to offer sacrifice. It is the act of the Bishop. The Presbytery have no part in it; and therefore if the seed of Apostolic Succession of Priesthood can only pass through the hands of the Bishop and Presbyters, then they possess it not in the Church of Rome.

CHAPTER III.

THE GROSSNESS OF SOME SUPERSTITIONS—WHETHER SANCTIONED BY THE CHURCH OF ROME—CONTRAST BETWEEN THE RELIGION OF THE ENGLISH AND THE ITALIANS—THE VIRTUE OF MIRACULOUS PICTURES—THE REALITY OF THEIR MIRACLES ASSERTED AND EXPLAINED—A CONVERT IN A NUNNERY—PARALLEL BETWEEN EVE AND MARY—THE RELIGION OF CHRIST BECOMING THE RELIGION OF MARY—THE NATURE OF THIS PROCESS EXPLAINED—MARY MORE MERCIFUL THAN CHRIST.

VERY shortly after this interview, one of my friends, who had undertaken to resolve my doubts and remove my objections to the Church of Rome, visited me again ; and after some preliminary conversation, he invited me to state my feelings.

I commenced by stating that I was very intimate with many of the popular objections to the Church of Rome ; that those objections had considerable influence upon many holy and good men ; that although some persons regarded them as founded on what might perhaps be regarded as an extravagant portraiture, as a caricature of Romanism, yet they had considerable weight, and ought to be clearly got rid of and removed from the field of controversy. I stated that there appeared to be many things that seemed not only extravagant, but even impossible from their palpable absurdity ; things that at times seemed so gross that no reasonable credulity could surmount them ; and which had the effect of raising an insurmountable objection against any communion with the Church of Rome, if indeed these things were part and parcel of her system, or in any way essential to her completeness ; and I added that if they were not essential they ought to have been got rid of as offensive to so many persons.

He replied, that he quite felt that there were many things to which my remarks would very justly apply, but that there were many others that were extravagant or absurd only in appearance ; and that it not unfrequently occurred that those things that at one time seemed liable to insurmountable objections, were afterwards adopted by converts without the least scruple or difficulty. He therefore wished me to specify some illustration.

I referred in return to the miraculous picture of the Virgin Mary, in the Church of S. Maria Maggiore—to the miraculous image of our Lord as a child in the church at Araceli—to the miraculous image of the Virgin Mary in the Church of the Augustines ; and to several other pictures and images, which were said to be miraculous, and which were worshipped with a special and peculiar devotion—were crowned and carried in procession precisely as the ancient heathens of Rome used to carry the images of their Gods. I stated that these things seemed very gross, and that usually in England the advocates of the Church of Rome got rid of all objections derived from them by disavowing all these things as abuses, as exaggerations, as bad or superstitious practices, which were not acknowledged or practised by the well-informed, and were not approved by the Church. I therefore would take the opportunity of asking him, living as he did at the fountain-head, and capable of informing me with some authority, whether others or myself could be justified in setting the objection aside in that way—namely, by attributing these things to the ignorance of the foolish and superstitious.

He answered without the least hesitation, and in a manner that took me by surprise. He answered that I had taken a very wrong view of these particulars, in regarding them as extravagant or absurd ; for, although they might appear strange to me, as at one time they had appeared to himself, so strange indeed as sometimes to be absolutely loathsome to his feelings, and although he felt himself unable to justify them in themselves, yet there was no doubt of their being approved in practice by the Church ; that they were no exaggeration or caricature, but real verities, which at one time were a stumbling-block and offence to his own mind. He added that there was much that might be said in their favor, for that the Italians were a people very different from the English ; that the English loved a religion of the heart, and the Italians a religion of the senses : the English a religion of the feelings, and the Italians a religion for the taste : the English an inward and spiritual religion, and the Italian an outward and visible religion ; and that it was the intention of the Church, as well as her duty, to arrange all the rites, ceremonies, acts, services of religion, so as to be suitable to an outward and visible religion, and calculated for the mind of Italy ; and thus those particulars concerning the crowning and processions of miraculous pictures and miraculous images, however strange and absurd to the

I expressed in strong terms my surprise at the position he had taken, expecting that he would have denied or softened these things, instead of asserting and defending them. And I took the opportunity of alluding to the coronation of the picture of Mary, in S. Maria Maggiore—a coronation by the present Pope, (Gregory XVI.) who crowned it amidst religious services with his own hands ; I also alluded to the procession which conducted the same picture through the streets, in order to suppress the cholera, a procession in which the present Pope joined bare-footed, and I asked whether we were to regard these acts, in which all the chiefs of the church, as the Pope, Cardinals, Bishops &c., took an active part, as the acts of the Church, sanctioning the opinions that pictures could work miracles, and that the procession of a picture of the Virgin Mary could possibly stay the virulence of the cholera, and that any particular picture was entitled to any special or peculiar devotion, as a coronation,—in short, entitled to more veneration than other pictures ?

To this he replied with frankness and decision, saying, that he had no doubt, and that there could be no doubt whatever, as to the miraculous powers of some Images and Pictures ; and he explained the matter thus. It sometimes occurred, he said, that some persons were affected—specially affected or moved by some pictures or images more than by others ; that in praying before these, their feelings were more touched, their sensibilities more excited and their devotional affections more drawn out in prayer ; that in answer to such prayer, God not unfrequently gives responses which were more marked than ordinary, and were to be regarded as miraculous answers to prayers made before miraculous pictures or images.

I could not avoid shewing my incredulity as to all this, and I certainly was as surprised as I was incredulous.

He observed this, but only continued to express himself more strongly, stating, that there was no doubt whatever as to the reality of many miracles of this nature in answer to such prayers ; and that when the report of these miracles spread abroad, when the public heard of them, when the minds of the devout were excited by the fame of them, then multitudes of persons naturally flocked to such pictures and images to pray before them ; and their feelings being excited, and their affections being the more drawn out by the circumstance, there were yet again other miracles wrought by God, and so these images and pictures became miraculous. He added that the picture of the Virgin at S. Maria Maggiore was such,—that the image of Mary at the church of the Augustinians was such—and that the picture of St. Ignatius praying to the Virgin in the Church of Gesu was, with many others, also miraculous.

I must frankly confess that I was wholly unprepared for this. In all my former experience of controversy in Ireland and England, I had been told that all those were the mere abuses of the superstitious, and not sanctioned by the learned ; if indeed such things were believed or practised anywhere. I had often heard them denounced as mere fabrications—pure inventions to injure the character of the Church of Rome, and I felt much surprise to find them not only believed and practised, but defended. I felt that it was opening out to me a new state of things, a new phase of mind, and a totally new system of faith or credulity, which I had never anticipated. A mind must be in a peculiar state to believe in the miraculous powers of a picture or image.

His explanation led me to advance a step in our argument, and to say that his statements seemed to imply that there was something peculiar to those images and pictures, something inherent in them as compared with others, something not in the Saint or Angel represented, but in these very pictures and images themselves. I endeavoured to illustrate my meaning by suggesting two pictures of the Virgin Mary placed side by side, and asking whether one being supposed to be miraculous, the people would pray before that one rather than the other ; and whether he believed the Virgin Mary would interfere with a miraculous answer for those who prayed to her before that one, rather than the other. I added, that if such was the case, it went to prove a belief that there was something peculiar, some virtue or power, something miraculous in such a picture, in one rather than the other ; and that the distinction proved that the people did look for something in pictures and images, more than the persons whom they were designed to represent.

He gave the fullest assent to this, saying, that they looked first of all to the Saint represented in the picture or image, and that then, in case there was a miraculous character, they looked also to that power or virtue. He added that his full belief was, that the Virgin Mary was more partial to some representations of herself than to others ; and that in order to induce the devout to pray before these her favorite ones, she heard and answered the prayers so offered, while she neglected those that were offered elsewhere—answering the prayers offered before one picture which she liked, and refusing those offered before a picture which she did not like.

This was a degree of credulity, not to say superstition, for which I was wholly unprepared: and I felt that there must be something in the atmosphere of Italy, or something in the training of the mind of Italy, that could lead an intelligent, a travelled, and educated man to such a state of credulity. I took occasion to remark,—which I did with all possible courtesy, to avoid giving offence,—that these things created an insurmountable barrier between England and Rome. I frankly stated that my judgment rejected, while my feelings recoiled and revolted from them—that so long as they might be regarded as mere abuses, or mere exaggerations of enthusiastic votaries, or as the pious frauds of Monks and Friars, they might be borne with as things to be flung away by the wise and good; but if regarded as true,—these pictures as miraculous pictures, these miracles as true miracles, such worship of the Virgin a right worship, they then presented a difficulty which could not be overcome. I felt it strange that all these things, so denied in England by the advocates of Romanism, should be so frankly avowed in Rome by the most intelligent of her priesthood.

In reply to all this, which he received in a most amiable spirit, he said that he could quite enter into my feelings—that his experience was not small, and that he knew of instances, where things that were at first viewed with loathings were afterwards received with facility. He mentioned the case of a lady, who had been a Protestant, but who had entered the Church of Rome and a Convent together. On going for the first time to confession, the penance imposed for some little sin was—to say the Litany of the blessed Virgin Mary! She declined, stating how repulsive that Litany was still to her opinions and feelings, so that she could not bring herself to say it, and begged that some other penance, which she could perform, might be imposed in its stead. Her request was complied with, and she was satisfied. And now her opinions and feelings have gradually and so completely changed, that she is able to repeat this Litany without the least repugnance. He continued to say, that if I changed my religion, I should experience a similar change in myself, and that what now seemed revolting would become in time very easily received.

I felt that this was an unhappy case, as it seemed to argue that the lady had only stifled her feelings and concealed her opinions, and perhaps had become hardened by use. And having already heard something of her hard lot, her struggles with want, her admission into a nunnery to enable her to live ; it looked as if her sad circumstances had led to her steeling her heart, and becoming careless as to any form of worship. My wife afterwards met her in her convent, and had some conversation with her. She invited my wife to attend the service in the chapel of the nunnery. My wife stated that she had heard it was requested, that all who entered the chapel should kneel and worship the Host, and that no one was admitted unless on that understanding. She replied that such was the case, but that my wife should remember that God might be in the Host, and that she might therefore safely worship him there. My wife said that she knew very well, that God was not in the Host more than in anything else ; and that believing this, she could not worship it without committing idolatry. The lady rejoined, that surely she could kneel and say her own prayers secretly, without saying them to the Host. My wife replied that would be insincerity and hypocrisy ; appearing in body to join in the worship, while in spirit being far otherwise. The lady promptly suggested, that even this was better than giving offence to the congregation, by refusing to worship the Host. Upon which my wife replied, it was better still to absent herself, and so neither offend God on one hand or the congregation on the other. This conversation left a very unfavourable impression on my wife, as to the simplicity and sincerity of the religious profession of this converted lady. But to return :—

My clerical friend, after a pause which I was unwilling to break, lest I should express myself as strongly as I felt, resumed the conversation, and said, that the worship of the Virgin Mary was a growing worship in Rome—that it was increasing in depth and intenseness of devotion ; and that there were now many of their divines, and he spoke of himself as agreeing with them in sentiment, who were teaching that as a woman brought in death, so a woman was to bring in life ;—that as a woman brought in sin, so a woman was to bring in holiness ;—that as Eve brought in damnation, so Mary was to bring in salvation ; and that the effect of this opinion was largely to increase the reverence and worship given to the Virgin Mary.

I said that I had read something of the kind, and also that I had seen a sort of parallel in some of the Fathers on the subject, but that it did not go so far as the modern opinion. But in order not to misunderstand him, and to prevent any mistake as to his views, I asked whether I was to understand him as implying, that as we regard Eve as the first sinner, so we are to regard Mary as the first Saviour ; one as the author of sin, and the other as the author of the remedy.

He replied that such was precisely the view he wished to express, and he added that it was taught by St. Alphonso de Liguori, and was a growing opinion. He seemed to think, from my seriousness of manner, that he had made an impression on me very different from the reality, for I was deeply grieved at his statement, in which there was not the least allusion to Christ. Mary seemed to be substituted for Christ.

I felt that he had gone very far, but I also felt he had not gone farther than my own impressions as to the religion of Italy, so far as I had seen it. I therefore took the opportunity of saying, what otherwise I would have been unwilling to express. I introduced it by some courteous and apologetic expressions, to prevent his taking any offence ; and assured him I felt happy in being able to speak my mind to one so capable of understanding and appreciating my feelings, and I prayed him not to be offended at my freedom. I then stated with all the seriousness the subject demanded, and all the solemnity I could command, that from all I had observed of the religion of Italy, whether as exhibited in the churches, displayed in processions, or expressed in private, whether as exhibited in the forms of prayer, in the object of worship, in the books of devotion, or in the conversation of the people, that it appeared to me to be characterised by one great feature, which forced itself unceasingly on my mind. It seemed to me that all tended to the honour of Mary, rather than to the honour of Christ ; and that it seemed to me to be carried to such an extreme, that I felt in my calm and sober judgment, that the religion of Italy ought to be called the religion of Mary, rather than the religion of Christ. I again apologised for so strong an opinion, but added that, feeling strongly on the point, I wished to express myself with a frankness and sincerity, which I hoped he would excuse.

I watched anxiously to see the impression of my words ; I feared that, as they would have elicited a burst of indignation, real or affected, among the Romanists of England or of Ireland, so they might possibly cause some offence even in Italy ; but it was far otherwise. He seemed quite unmoved, as if he received my words as a matter of course —as expressing something very natural and of no unfrequent occurrence. His reply was made with perfect ease and entire frankness.

He stated, that my impression was very natural, that such was really the appearance of things ; that coming from Germany, where Christ on the cross was the ordinary object of veneration, into Italy, where the Virgin Mary was the universal object of reverence, it was no more than natural such an impression should have been created : that such an impression was very much the reality of the case ; and that to his own knowledge, the religion of Italy was latterly becoming less and less the religion of Christ ; and that “ the devotion of the most Holy Virgin,” as he called it, was certainly on the increase.

I was perfectly startled, not indeed at the statement itself, for it was too palpably true to escape the observation of any one ; but that a man, a minister of Christianity, should describe such a state of things with the manifest approval he exhibited. We were shocked.

He perceived this, and then proceeded to justify himself with an ingenuity and address that laid open the system, and exhibited the worship of Mary in a new light, at least in a light in which I had never seen it before. He stated, that there was a great difference in the bent or habit of mind, between English Protestants on one hand, and Italian Romanists on the other ; that Protestants habitually let their minds dwell on Christ's teaching, on Christ's working miracles, and especially on Christ's suffering, bleeding, dying on the cross ; so that in a Protestant mind, the great object was Christ in the maturity of his manhood ; but that Romanists habitually dwelt on the childhood of Christ ; not on the great events that were wrought in maturity and manhood, but on those interesting scenes which were connected with his childhood. He then went on to say that this habit of mind led to the great difference, that as Protestants always dwelt on the suffering and dying Christ, so Christ in a Protestant mind was always connected with the cross ; and that as Romanists constantly meditated rather on the childhood of Christ, so Christ in a Romanist's mind was usually associated with his mother, the Virgin Mary. He then continued to say that the constant dwelling of the mind in contemplation on the child, naturally led to more thought, more contemplation, more affection, and finally more devotion for the mother ; that when one thinks of all the little scenes of His childhood, dwells on the little incidents of interest between the child

Jesus and the mother Mary, recollects that she had him enshrined in her womb, that she used to lead him by the hand, that she had listened to all his innocent prattle, that she had observed the opening of his mind ; and that during all those days of his happy childhood she, and she alone of all the world, knew that that little child whom she bore in her womb and nursed at her breasts and fouldled in her arms, was her God—that when a man thinks, and habitually thinks of all this, the natural result is that his affections will be more drawn out, and his feelings of devotion more elevated towards Mary. And he concluded by stating that this habit of mind was becoming more general, and that it was to it that he would attribute the great increase, that late years had witnessed in the devotion to the Virgin Mary.

My wife and myself were much struck with all this. It was, I must freely acknowledge, perfectly new to me, and greatly interested us. It was a new view of the system, of the means by which the system is spread, and quite a new phase of mind ; while the pleasing manner and evident sincerity and enthusiasm of the man, gave an additional charm to his words. We did not conceal the interest we felt in his statement, and he seemed pleased at his success, and continued :

He said, that all this devotion to Mary, however repugnant to the feelings and judgments of Protestants, was capable of being justified, or at least was capable of being accounted for on a principle very well known, and recognised among Protestants themselves. He said it was to be ascribed to the feeling universal among Romanists, that the Virgin Mary was more merciful, more gentle, and more ready to hear, than Christ ; and he added, that among Protestants it was often thought that the Son, Jesus Christ, was more merciful, gentle and ready to hear than God the Father, from their feeling that in the manhood of Jesus Christ, there is that which creates a sympathy in Him with them ; and that in the same way Romanists feel that there is even more in the Virgin Mary common with them, so as to create still greater sympathy on her part.

On my wife remarking here upon the unsoundness of the idea, which he attributed to Protestants, namely of regarding the Son as more merciful and gentle and ready to hear than the Father ; adding, that the Father shewed his love in giving his Son, as much as the Son in giving himself—On this he at once assented that the principle was unsound and wrong, and involved a very false view of the Godhead ; but that yet there were many among Protestants who held it in their ignorance ; and that many of them, influenced by it, do actually pray to the Son more than to the Father. They feel that the Son is Man as well as God, and that manhood ensures a sympathy which makes him more accessible ; and that the Romanists feel that Mary is altogether of their own nature, and that this ensures a more perfect sympathy, so as to make Mary more accessible than Christ, and that this feeling leads them to pray with more frequency, as well as with more confidence, to Mary than to Christ.

It was impossible not to recognise the ingenuity of this, and at the same time it was as impossible not to acknowledge, that there was too much justice in what he stated, as to the feeling of many Protestants. But it was saddening indeed to the heart to witness the wiles and subtleties with which the fallen heart is ensnared and the fallen intellect entangled ; and still more saddening, even to fearfulness and trembling, to hear the Saviour practically dethroned from his High Priesthood and Mediatorship, and one of his creatures exalted to his place, as the object of affection, devotion and prayer, on the ground of so awful an error as that Mary is more merciful, more gentle, and more ready to hear than Christ. I knew the danger of speaking out, of speaking my opinions openly, and yet I could not let such a statement pass without some notice ; that even, if it had no effect on him, would at least clear my own conscience. So I spoke of the love of Christ, a love exhibited in leaving the heavens for us,—a love exhibited in all the sweetness of his words,—a love exhibited in all the benevolence of his acts,—and above all a love exhibited in all the mysterious agony in the garden, the infinite sufferings of the judgment-hall, and the awful scenes of Calvary, even a love still exhibited in the heavens, where he yet pleads for the sinner, as if heaven were no heaven to him, if his people be not there ! And I asked how it was possible, that there could be imagined a Being more merciful, more gentle, or more ready to hear ? “ God commended his love towards us, in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us ; ” and “ greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friend ; ” and again, He pleads himself with us, “ Can a woman forget her sucking-child, that she should not have compassion on the Son of her womb ? Yea, they may forget, yet will I not forget thee.” Here indeed is love expressed and proved, and there is neither love expressed nor love proved by the Virgin Mary ; while it seems the basest ingratitude, the most heartless return to a Saviour of such infinite love, “a love that passeth knowledge,” to harbour for one moment the thought, that it could be surpassed, especially by one, who at the best is but a creature still.

I do not think, that this produced any serious impression on my companion ; and certainly it had no effect on his reasoning, farther than to say, that he thought it a wrong principle for Protestants to regard Christ as more merciful than the Father ; and so making that a ground for praying more frequently to him ; but that it was the very same principle, only applied to the Virgin Mary, that led the Church of Rome to regard her as more merciful than Christ, and therefore to pray more frequently to her.

I observed here, that this took away the ground on which they prayed to Mary so much more frequently than to Christ ; and that to say the least of the system, the praying to her more frequently than to him, bore the complexion of Idolatry—as lowering him and exalting her, and giving the love, the devotion, the prayers to Mary, which ought to be rendered to God alone.

He rejoined by saying, that there was a distinction always observed in the minds of the people, between the worship rendered to Christ, and the worship rendered to Mary.

I replied, that although the more intelligent and enlightened of the Roman Church, might understand and be able to maintain that distinction, while in the act of worship, yet it was evident that the mass of the population, and of the children, were both incapable of understanding it or of observing it. I added that the distinction of their theologians between Latria, Dulia, and Hyperdulia, had never been clearly defined; and that I had never seen a member of the Church of Rome, whether Ecclesiastical or Lay, who could clearly state the difference between them.

In answer to this he said, that however difficult it was to explain—and he acknowledged it was very difficult—yet it was universally known and understood;—that the youngest children and the most ignorant adults, all recognised the distinction, and could never fall into any mistake respecting it; but that feeling that Christ was the Almighty God, infinitely above them, and that Mary was a creature like themselves, and of the same human feelings with themselves, they conceived she would have more sympathies with them, and therefore they prayed more frequently to her.

To this I rejoined, by again expressing my conviction, that it was impossible that the mass of the poor and ignorant people, could understand the distinctions which their most learned Theologians were unable to explain—that although they were told that latria belonged to God, hyperdulia to the Virgin, and dulia to the Saints,—that although they were told of these three kinds of worship, yet they could not distinguish between them; and most certainly could not act upon them—that frequently they prayed in the same form, for the same objects, and in the very same words, to God, and to Mary, and to the Saints, without making the least difference between them.

I then referred to the well-known prayer, to the saying of which, in the year 1817, an Indulgence of three hundred days was attached. It was in the words.

“ Jesus, Joseph, Mary, I give you my heart and soul ;
“ Jesus, Joseph, Mary, assist me in my last agony ; “ Jesus, Joseph, Mary, I breathe my soul to you in peace.”

Here, I said, was a prayer addressed to God, to the Virgin, and to a Saint,—addressed to one and all alike, addressing them for the very same objects, and making no distinction whatever between them. Here was a case, in which the three degrees of worship were all demanded. There was God, for whom latrīa was required ; hyperdulīa for the Virgin ; and dulīa for Joseph. And I added, that as the people used the same words to each—employed the same form of petition to each—asked for the same things from each—offered and expressed the same devotion to each ; it could hardly be asserted, that they were not worshipping them all alike.

He evidently felt this a great difficulty. He acknowledged that he knew the prayer, and that it was of frequent use among the people, and that at first appearance it seemed objectionable ; but he insisted that the people knew the distinction so well, that no man, or woman, or child, could possibly fall into the error of praying to God, and Mary, and Joseph alike. It might appear to me, that their words and form and manner of worship being the same, the worship itself was the same ; but that nothing was more certain, than that they observed a distinction in their own minds, and did not really pray to them, or worship them alike, even in that prayer, which was addressed to Jesus, Joseph, and Mary simultaneously.

I felt that reasoning farther on this precise point, was neither profitable nor judicious ; and therefore only remarked, that I was well able to judge of the form of prayer itself; and knew that it was addressed to all alike, but that as to distinction in the minds of the people, neither he nor I could be competent judges. Neither of us could read the heart, and therefore neither of us ought to say anything, as to what may or may not be in the secret mind of others. Our province is to judge of the outward action, and that outward action was one of prayer and devotion to all the three alike.

He made no objection to this, but directed our conversation into another channel. It was some time before I could bring him back without any apparent effort to the same point. He then resumed it, by alluding to something that had passed between us; and then remarked, as he had done on that occasion, that the devotion to the Virgin Mary was very popular, that latterly it was become increasingly so; and that he knew personally of many facts, that proved it to be a growing devotion among all classes.

My wife remarked, that she had been in conversation with a religious Italian lady, who was lamenting the vice and wickedness that abounded in Rome; and who concluded by saying, that her only consolation and hope for Rome was, that the devotion to the Most Holy Mary, santissima Maria, was so much on the increase!

He stated that such was the fact, and proceeded to relate some little incidents to illustrate it. He mentioned the frequency with which he heard the poor and simple people praying to the Virgin,—singing hymns to her pictures at the corner of the streets early in the morning,—appealing to her for protection in moments of danger; and he detailed a scene which he had himself witnessed. It was the case of a very little child, that conceived itself in great danger, and immediately cried aloud to the Virgin, ‘O Mamma, Mamma Mia, Mamma Mia, O Mamma!’ He supposed the little child so well taught to regard the Virgin Mary as her heavenly Mother, and so truly pious and devoted, as to have addressed these words to her; and he was touched to tears—the tear glistened in his eye as he told the incident, being evidently touched at the idea of so much piety in so young a child.

I remarked at the moment, that to me it seemed as if the child was only crying for its own mother, at least it was like the cry of some child in England, who had never heard of the Virgin Mary.

He said that in the case he mentioned, there was no doubt that it was the cry of a child appealing to its Heavenly Mother. He added that there was something among the Italians,—something in the Italian mind, and Italian feeling, that led them particularly to devotion to the Virgin,—that while in Germany the prayers of the Roman Catholics are directed to the crucifix, to the figure of our Lord upon the cross, it is quite otherwise in Italy, where all the devotion of the people, and all their prayers, are addressed to the pictures and images of Mary; that, however it was to be accounted for, the fact was so, and that it was increasing and likely to increase yet more.

I remarked that his words seemed to imply, that there was a process of change gradually going on in the Church of Rome, in reference to the Virgin; and that thus the religion of Rome was becoming more and more the religion of Mary. I then added, that I had seen some remarkable things in a work by St. Alphonso De Liguori. It was entitled “The Glories of Mary,” and among other things described the vision of St. Bernard, in which he beheld two ladders extending from earth to heaven,—two ways by which the sinner could have access to heaven. At the top of one ladder appeared Jesus Christ. At the top of the other ladder appeared the Virgin Mary ; and that while those, who endeavoured to enter into heaven by the way of Christ’s ladder, fell constantly back and utterly failed, those on the other hand who tried to enter by the ladder of Mary, all succeeded, because she put forth her hands to assist and encourage them. I mentioned also, that I had seen this as an altar-piece in a Church at Milan, where the two ladders were represented, reaching from earth to heaven ; Jesus Christ at the head of one, and Mary at the head of the other ; and while none were succeeding by the ladder of Christ, all were succeeding by the ladder of the Virgin ! I added that this was degrading Christ, in order to exalt the Virgin, and that it was representing her as a more merciful and effectual Saviour, than the Saviour Himself ! I felt that I could apply no other language to this, than that I could not imagine a more hideous blasphemy, than the language of Liguori, or a more frightful sacrilege than such a picture beside the altar of a Church.

He said mildly, that he could not approve of such things, that though such things were often said and often done ; for himself he could not do otherwise than condemn them ; that though he could not go so far as to apply to them such terms as blasphemy and sacrilege, yet he could not but strongly disapprove of them ; but still he believed they were capable, when rightly interpreted, of being understood in an orthodox and unobjectionable sense.

I then alluded to other pictures of the Virgin Mary, and I reprobated the practice of representing Mary, as the chief or principal figure in the picture ; and Jesus Christ being introduced as a subordinate figure—as a figure that was merely accessory to her's, a sort of appendage to her, as if he was introduced merely to shew, that the figure of a female was intended as the figure of Mary—as if, there being innumerable female figures in such pictures,—figures of various saints,—it was necessary to introduce the child Jesus to shew that this female figure was intended for Mary. The figure of St. Catherine is recognised among all others, by the introduction of the wheel. The figure of St. Margaret is similarly distinguished, by the introduction of a tower. In precisely the same spirit the figure of Mary is recognised, by the introduction of the infant Jesus. But as with St. Catherine and St. Margaret the wheel and the tower are mere accessories, by which they may be recognised, so in the pictures of Mary, the child Jesus is nothing else than a mere accessory to identify her ! I expressed myself strongly against this practice, as an awful dishonour to Christ. It was making God the creator a mere secondary to a creature.

He again expressed himself, as disapproving of such pictures, saying that although others approved of and liked them, yet he did not think them altogether justifiable.

I then called his attention to a large number of pictures, to be seen in almost every Church. They are designed to represent the Virgin Mary in heaven, enthroned above the clouds and encircled by angels and cherubs, and even there she is represented with the infant Jesus in her arms ! It could not possibly be that either the Artists who paint, or the Priests who suspend these pictures over the altar, suppose that Jesus Christ is now an infant still, in the arms of Mary in heaven—that He is still an infant in heaven; and therefore it is apparent that He is introduced, thus absurdly and improperly, as a mere accessory to distinguish the figure of Mary from the figure of any other saint! I added that there were few things in the Church of Rome that so offended us, as dishonouring to Christ, as this system of making Mary the principal person, and Christ only the secondary person in their pictures. It seemed an index of the state of Italian religion, in which Mary seemed first, and Christ second in prominence, as if it was the religion of Mary rather than the religion of Christ. I added yet farther, that it was singular that in the Church of Gesu e Maria in the Corso; where the sermons are preached in English for the conversion of the English, there are no less than three large altar-pieces,— pictures larger than life, representing the Virgin Mary with the infant Jesus in heaven!

He said that he quite agreed with me that such things ought not to be—that the representing Mary as enthroned in heaven, and our Lord as a child in her arms, was ignorant, absurd, and untrue—contrary to right teaching; but that unhappily there was too much of it. He went on to say, that the Church had never done it—never sanctioned it; and although it certainly was done, yet as certainly it was without the sanction or approval of the Church.

I said that the Church had tacitly sanctioned it. It had ever been held that where any doctrine or practice had been propagated, and the Church had not interfered with it or condemned it, that she was then to be regarded as permitting it. I said that in this way, the Church tacitly sanctioned the practice ; for as these things were not done in a corner, but were done in a large portion of the Churches, so they must be known to the authorities and permitted by them. I alluded to a picture of the Virgin, in the chapel under St. Peter's, with an inscription that it had miraculously shed blood when struck with a stone ; and another picture of the Virgin at Arezzo, which had miraculously shed tears of grief, at hearing the profane language of some drunkards ; and another picture of her that was shown at Rome, which miraculously wept before the whole congregation, at the invasion of the French. And more strange than all, a picture of the Virgin and child at Lucca, of which it was affirmed, that when some one flung a stone at the face of the child, she most wonderfully transferred the child to the other arm, and thus saved it from injury—a wonder indeed for a mere picture to perform ! I argued that all these, and a thousand similar things, were known to the authorities, and therefore the Church by permitting them, did tacitly sanction them, and must be held responsible.

He replied, by stating that many of these things were undoubtedly untrue, but that many of them were undoubtedly true—that in either case the Church had never given her authority to any of them—that individual Priests, and Bishops, and even Popes believed and sanctioned them, but the Church had never done so. He added, that although they were exhibited in Churches, approved by the Priests of those Churches, and sanctioned by inscriptions on the walls of the Churches, yet they were not authorised by the Church. The people might believe or might not believe them, but the Church was not responsible. She left her people at liberty, and the responsibility lay with the Priests and people themselves, and not with the Church.

I said in return, that I was to infer that a belief in such miraculous pictures of the Virgin Mary, was not confined to the ignorant of the populace, but was received among the learned and enlightened of the Priesthood. His words seemed to imply as much.

He at once replied, that he could not answer for others, but that for himself he did not believe the greater portion of such narratives—that the Roman Breviary was full of such tales of wonders and miracles, as of men, whose heads were cut off, and yet who afterwards took up their own heads, and carried them away in their hands ! He added, laughing, that he could not believe such things, of which some were unreasonable and foolish, and even known and proved to be false and impossible.

In the Church of S. Stefano Rotundo, among other representations of martyrdom, S. Dionysius is represented as walking in full episcopal robes at the head of a procession, holding his head streaming with blood in his hands ! It is said that, after being decapitated, he quietly took up his own head in his hands, and walked away with it to the no small astonishment of all.

This was as much as I could expect. I pressed him no more on the subject, and soon after our interview ended.

CHAPTER IV.

A VISIT FROM A CONVERT TO ROMANISM—ARGUMENT DRAWN FROM HIS EXPERIENCE OF HAPPINESS—MOTIVE TO REST ENTIRELY ON THE INFALLIBILITY OF THE CHURCH—THE INFALLIBLE TRIBUNAL AMONG PROTESTANTS CONTRASTED WITH THAT AMONG ROMANISTS—ARGUMENTS FOR INFALLIBILITY — THE SCRIPTURES — TRADITION — THE FATHERS.

I EXPECTED the promised visit of a reverend gentleman who had originally been a Protestant, and had entered the Church of Rome.

Our conversation commenced, after his arrival, by my observing to him, that I understood he had once been a Protestant, and that he had now become a Roman Catholic. I expressed myself as much gratified in making his acquaintance, and being able thus to state my opinions, feelings, and difficulties, to one who could understand and appreciate them. I had felt that much and many of the difficulties which pressed upon the mind of an English Protestant, were altogether unintelligible to a mind, so peculiarly constituted and habituated as that of an Italian Romanist,—that it might therefore be feared that my feelings could scarcely be adequately appreciated by our mutual friend the Padre M—, so as to enlist his sympathies : but now that I had to converse with one who had himself been a Protestant, I felt assured that he would understand and sympathise with me.

He replied by stating, that he had always until his arrival at Rome been a Protestant,—that, after a long and painful struggle, he was convinced of the course which it became him to pursue,—that he therefore came to Rome, and after some communication with the Jesuits there, formally renounced his former opinions, and was received as a member of the Church of Rome. He entered into some details of his former history, in fact the story of his life, and concluded by saying that he had never known peace or happiness, until he had taken the final step ; and then, and from that moment, he had experienced a tranquillity of mind and a satisfaction of feeling, a joy and delight which he had never known before. Instead of being disturbed in mind he felt calm,—instead of being restless he had peace,—instead of unhappiness he had full satisfaction,—instead of uncertainty, he had the most perfect certainty ; and thus from the moment of his seeking rest in the bosom of His Holy Mother the Church of Rome, like the wandering child in the bosom of its loving Mother, he experienced in her embrace and communion the most perfect happiness. He then added, that he believed this happiness was experienced by all, who like him embraced the Church of Rome,—that he knew it to be the experience of others as well as his own,—that he could not regard it otherwise, than as the special gift and blessing of God,—the reward of heaven to those who entered his true Church ; and that if I took the same step, I should assuredly be partaker of the same reward.

I answered all this by stating that I could well understand it, as I had seen very much of the same nature in the case of persons, who had acted in a manner the very opposite to that which he had adopted. I had known many persons, who had been brought up from infancy, in all the principles and practices of the Church of Rome,—who, by the reading of the Holy Scriptures, or by hearing the preaching of the Gospel, had been led to entertain doubts as to the verity of their former faith, and to receive and adopt the simple and scriptural principles of Protestantism ; and so to go on to the final step of embracing the communion of Protestants ; and such persons had often told me of the peace of mind and happiness of heart,—the gush of joy and delight that they experienced in forsaking by that act, what they regarded as the unscriptural and unstable errors of one Church, for the scriptural and stable truth of the other ; speaking with rapturous extacy of peace and joy which they had never known before, and of the sweetness of which they had previously had no conception. I added, that I supposed this feeling among those who embraced the Roman faith, and among those who embraced the Protestant faith—this feeling common to both alike, may arise from the casting aside the doubts and difficulties, that had previously occupied and absorbed the mind ; but that I could not regard it as a reward or recompense for the final step,—that I could not think that God would give this reward to both sides, to the Romanist for embracing Protestantism, and to the Protestant for embracing Romanism.

He said in return, that he had sometimes heard of such things, and that he was not quite sure whether he ought to doubt or aeknowledge them. But that for himself and his own experience, he could entertain no doubt whatever. For years the conflict had raged within him : principle struggled with principle, one series of apparent truths held conflict with another series of truths equally apparent, till he was tost to and fro, and reeled like a ship upon the waves, now inclining to Protestantism, and then leaning to Romanism, till he felt all faith giving way, and to save himself from infidelity he resolved to embrace the Church of Rome ;—that if he had not done so he must certainly have ended in infidelity,—that he had been rushing headlong into that awful abyss, till he was saved by entering the Church of Rome, and from that moment all was peace and joy, every doubt vanished and every difficulty fled away, and all was now tranquillity and happiness. He then assured me that if I would only take the same course,—if I would resolve to fling away my doubts and difficulties,—if instead of making objections and answering arguments, and requiring reasons and proofs,—if instead of all this I would but fling them to the winds, and boldly and unhesitatingly enter the Church of Rome, I should escape all the harassing anxieties of doubt, and all the awfulness of infidelity, and receive my reward in the peacefulness and tranquillity of soul, which he had himself experienced, and which it was absolutely impossible I could ever experience otherwise ; for that I must else continue in doubt and difficulty, and that my doubts must increase, and my difficulty become still more difficult, and my whole mind become so mystified and perplexed and entangled, that I must end in infidelity. There was no escape but in the Church of Rome.

I could not but smile, while I thanked him for his anxiety about my doubts and difficulties ; and I assured him, that I had never any doubt or difficulty, as to the truth of all required of me as a member of the Church of England ; that the only doubts and difficulties of which I was conscious, had reference not to the Church of England, but to the Church of Rome ;—that, residing as I then was in the city of Rome, the seat of that Church, I was forced to consider whether I could hold communion with her,—that having been invited to join myself to her, I felt doubts and difficulties of so cogent a nature, in my judgment, to such a step, that I had not done so ; and that I never could do so, unless my objections to the Church of Rome were fully removed. I added that my previous communications with Padre M——, arose from his proposal that I should freely state my objections, and thus give him an opportunity of answering and removing them.

He replied by saying, that he had been under a mistake, but that it need not affect our communications, as he could quite understand, and enter into my feelings on the point, the more so as he had himself had long and sad experience of the same state of mind,—that he had indeed been bitterly tried and sadly perplexed by difficulties, by prejudices and by distastes,—that he was conscious of a feeling amounting to repugnance and loathing of some things, and seemingly an impossibility of believing others,—that in all these he had probably felt as many and as great difficulties, as those which now stood in my way, and opposed my union with the Church of Rome ; and that if he had listened to them and continued to argue them out, as I seemed disposed to do, he should probably have continued a Protestant to the present day, or rather, as he immediately corrected himself, he should probably have become an Infidel, for he had brought himself to that pass, that he had reasoned himself into the belief, that the Church or religion of Rome seemed to him more natural, more reasonable, more consistent and better put together, than the Church or religion of Christ, so far as it could be gathered from the Scriptures ; and thus he must become either a Catholic or an Infidel, embracing the Church of Rome or none at all. He continued to say, that my only as well as my most comfortable course, was to fling aside all my mental difficulties, no longer to debate or argue the objections ; but remembering they had all been already decided by the Infallible authority of the Church, dismiss them for ever from my mind ; that he had himself felt the advantage and comfort of this, for that a doubt on any point, as for example, on Transubstantiation, never crossed his mind. Whatever difficulties might exist, they never troubled him now, for he laid them all on the tribunal, which had already infallibly decided them.

I said in reply to all this, that I could well understand such a course, as an easy and effectual way of disposing of some difficulties ; and that I had long been in the habit of acting on it. I fully felt the value and indeed the necessity for a tribunal, an infallible tribunal to determine the religious difficulties of my mind, and I knew and felt they could not be satisfactorily and safely determined, by mere human authority, my mind being so constituted, as to require the decision of Divine authority to satisfy it : and that I therefore felt the necessity of referring all to an infallible authority.

My friend seemed to accept this as all he required, and was about to proceed with his argument, when I continued to say, that I had found and felt that the Holy Scriptures were the Word of God,—that they were inspired by Him, and therefore were infallible ; that being of Divine and not mere human authority, they were an infallible tribunal to whose decisions our difficulties should be referred,—that by God's grace and mercy, my mind was completely subdued and submissive to them ; so subdued and submissive, that no matter how opposed to previous convictions any statement might be, yet if only it was clearly maintained or justified by the Holy Scriptures, I at once bowed to it as of Divine and infallible authority. I added that the difference between him and me was, that he bowed to a supposed authority, the inspiration and divinity of which I denied ; while I bowed to an authority, whose inspiration and divinity was admitted by all. He yielded to the decisions of the Papal Bulls, while I bowed to the decisions of the Holy Scriptures.

His answer to this was precisely what I had anticipated. He acknowledged that in appealing to the Holy Scriptures, the Protestants appealed to that which must be recognised as an infallible tribunal ; but that he objected to the practical inutility of the Holy Scriptures to such a purpose, as unfitted and inadequate to the wants of the Church. He argued that this unfitness and inadequacy, arose from their liability to a variety of interpretations on the part of a variety of persons,—that if ten men could be produced united in one interpretation, he could produce ten more insisting upon some opposite or different one ; and neither had right or authority to say the other was wrong ; and thence he argued that this liability to a diversity of interpretation, was a fatal objection to the fitness or adequacy of the Holy Scriptures, for the determination of controversies or the solution of difficulties.

I rejoined to this, that although the argument had often before been urged in many works of controversy, yet it had never seemed to me to have weight in the matter for which it was adduced, because the very same objection in all its force was as applicable to the system of the Church of Rome. If appeal be made to the canon law,—if reference be made to the writings of the primitive Fathers,—if the appeal be made to the decrees of Councils,—if the reference be made to the Bulls of Popes,—if, in short, it be made to any documents, supposed to contain the infallible mind of the Church, there will be found as great a diversity of interpretation, as if the reference be made to the Holy Scriptures. They all have been and still are as liable to diversity of interpretation as the Holy Scriptures ; so that if he could produce ten men for one interpretation, I could produce ten more for a different interpretation ; and for every ten Roman Catholic authors, whom he might adduce as teaching infallibility, as residing in the Popes, and not in the Councils, I could adduce ten others teaching that infallibility resides in the Councils and not in the Popes. And I argued, that if a liability to a diversity of interpretation, or variety of opinion, were an adequate objection to the Holy Scriptures, as the final tribunal of appeal in questions of religion, then a similar liability must be an adequate objection against the writings of Fathers, the Canons of Rome, the decrees of Councils, or the Bulls of Popes. They all were liable to diversity of interpretation, and variety of opinion.

He acknowledged frankly and at once, that he thought my answer was sufficient, so far as those writings, Canons, Decrees and Bulls, that have been already passed or written, are concerned. They are now written documents, and as such they necessarily become liable to various interpretations in the hands of able and subtle men. They are all therefore in the same category, and liable to the same objection as the Holy Scriptures. He would fully admit all this. But he thought that the great advantage of the Church of Rome consisted in having one, who, as the Head of the Church, was a living and speaking Judge, who could at any moment determine infallibly the question under debate ; and that it was better to refer such question to the infallible decision of the Pope, as Head of the Church, than to the Holy Scriptures, which every disputant would interpret as suited his purpose. He then went on to speak of the comfort of being able to fling away the mental difficulties, and intellectual doubtings, with which some minds were oppressed, stating how he had felt it in his own experience ; and that I could never know the end of such difficulties and doubtings, until like him, I resolved to cast them all aside and lay the responsibility of all the right or wrong, all the truth or error connected with them, on the infallibility of this infallible authority. And he concluded by saying, in very complimentary terms, that as my mind was an inquiring one, and also a logical one, it was the more necessary for me to take this course; as it was evident, from the very character of my mind, that I must end in Infidelity if I did not embrace Catholicity.

I thanked him with all courtesy, for the complimentary terms in which he was pleased to describe the character of my mind ; and I earnestly begged that he would accept the inquiring and logical nature of my mind, in apology for pressing so much for proofs and evidences before I received any important statement. The character of my mind required proofs, and must be my excuse to him for asking what proof, what evidence, what argument he could adduce, on which he would ask me to believe in the existence of any Infallible Tribunal on earth, other and besides the Holy Scriptures. I observed that he had repeatedly asserted the existence of such Infallible Tribunal,—that he had offered it to me as a panacea or remedy for all my difficulties,—that he pressed it as a resolver of all my objections to the Church of Rome,—that he avowed it as the basis of all his faith, as touching eternity ; and that he presented the whole system of his religion, his faith and hope, and the important step of embracing the Church of Rome, as founded upon one point, namely, that there was a living and speaking Infallible Tribunal on earth, other and beside the Holy Scriptures. I therefore asked with all earnestness and solemnity—As you say my mind is a logical one, so you will believe that my mind requires a clear, cogent, unanswerable proof of the actual existence of such a tribunal ; and I therefore ask—On what evidence, proof or argument, do you present it to me ? You say that all,—Catholicity, Protestantism, Infidelity, depend on the reception or rejection of it. Heaven and Hell depend on it. It requires a strong foundation, for it has much to carry.

He assented to this, and said he would at once enter on the question. He then proceeded to say that one argument for the existence of this tribunal was,—necessity. He referred to the variety of opinions that agitate and distract the Church,—to the conflicting elements which characterize the different sects, to the difficulties that beset the pathway of every inquirer,—to the doubts and conflicts that perpetually oppress the minds of thinking men,—to the difficulties apparently, perhaps really, insurmountable, that surround some minds,—he referred to these as creating a necessity for some tribunal. He said the minds of men were in doubt, and an infallible tribunal is necessary to resolve those doubts,—that there are diversities of opinions as to faith and practice, agitating various sections of the Church, and an infallible tribunal is necessary to decide between them,—that there were sects and schisms innumerable, all maintaining opposite doctrines, and an infallible tribunal is necessary to determine and settle all. He thus based his argument on the supposed necessity.

To this I replied by saying, that in the Holy Scriptures we possessed that which all Christian Churches regarded as the word of God, and therefore infallible ; and that the necessity of which he spoke, was thus fully provided for. We have in them an infallible tribunal, and we see no necessity for any other, and especially such an one as decrees of Councils, or Bulls of Popes, which are often directly contradictory and opposed to one another, and all of which are liable to diversity of interpretation as much as the Holy Scriptures, so that we gain nothing by leaving the Scriptures and flying to them. I then added, that he had assumed a necessity for some infallible tribunal, and I appealed to him, asking whether as a Logician, he was satisfied with his own argument,—whether it was good logic or sound reasoning, to say that there are diversities of opinion, and therefore there is a necessity for an infallible tribunal, and therefore there is such a tribunal; whether such a syllogism could be used in the College of Nobles, of which he was a tutor;—where was the vis consequentiae, by which he could conclude the existence of a thing from the imagined necessity or convenience of the thing. I asked whether, as a logician, he really thought that so important a point as the existence of an infallible tribunal, was sufficiently demonstrated by a mere opinion of the great convenience or necessity for it, in the present state of the Church; and I asked further, whether as a Christian he would think me justified in placing all my faith on that which seemed so inadequately proved.

He paused some time before he replied. It appeared to me, as I observed him, that he was struggling with himself, as if he felt that the answer he was about to give, was other than he wished. His manner was different from the confidence and self-possession he had previously shewn. After some moments, he smiled good-humouredly at his own argument, as it seemed to me; and he frankly stated that it did not satisfy himself, that he could not defend the logic of it, and that of course the argument must go for nothing; adding freely and with a good-humoured smile, that he thought I should not be justified in changing my religious views upon such grounds.

I could not, after so frank an admission on his part, press further on the point; but I asked him whether he could advance any further and more satisfactory argument, reminding him that he had asked me to cast aside all my reasonings, my doubttings, my difficulties, and my objections, and to lay the solution and responsibility of all on the infallible tribunal ; and that the argument ought therefore to be logical, cogent, and unanswerable.

He answered by saying, that he could prove its existence, from the usefulness and convenience of such a tribunal; so useful and convenient, that we must suppose a good and beneficent God must have granted it to the Church. He then repeated his former statement, touching similarly on the doubts, the divisions, the conflicts, the sects of the Church ; and he argued that an infallible tribunal would be so desirable, so advantageous, so consistent with the goodness and beneficence of God, in order to remedy these evils in the Church, that God may well be supposed to have established a tribunal so useful and convenient.

I asked him quietly—Do you yourself think, that your proving it to be convenient or useful or desirable for the Church, is really proving that it does exist in the Church? Do you yourself think, that in logic you are justified in inferring the existence of anything, from the supposed usefulness of the thing ?

He at once and with the utmost candour admitted, that his argument had so far failed, that I should not be justified in believing the existence of an infallible tribunal, on the grounds he had stated. He seemed perplexed, as if unprepared to enter further on the argument, or as if he had never before considered the point with sufficient care. I was much surprised at his apparent confusion, and could not well understand his being so unprepared on so important a question.

I added, however, that the supposed convenience and usefulness of an infallible tribunal, was the argument most generally urged in its behalf,—the argument usually unfolded in writing, and urged in conversation, at least so far as my personal experience extended; so that it seemed to me to be the main basis or foundation of this important matter; and that I really was unable to understand, how thinking and earnest men could hazard all their faith and hope, and peril all the destinies of eternity, on a principle founded, as it seemed to my poor judgment, on so frail and inadequate a basis. I felt myself that I could not do so. It would, I acknowledged, undoubtedly be very convenient and useful for us, that Hell with all its horrors should be annihilated; but we are not justified in believing therefore that Hell is annihilated. It would also without any question, be useful and convenient for us beyond expression, that sin should be abolished and driven from the world; but we are not therefore to infer that sin is so abolished. The annihilation of Hell, and the abolition of our liability to sin, would be an act that in our eyes might seem very consistent with the goodness and compassion and beneficence of God; but we were not thence to infer, that He has annihilated the one, or abolished the other. And in the same way, I continued, our proving the convenience or usefulness of an infallible tribunal, other and besides the Holy Scriptures, or its suitableness to the goodness of God, cannot be regarded as any adequate argument to prove that God has actually established it. The question is,—not what God could or might have done, but what he has done.

The conversation now assumed a most unexpected phase.

He frankly and at once, and with no little emotion, acknowledged that his arguments had failed,—that my answer was sufficient to set it aside,—that his argument was illogical, and that at the best all he had urged could not prove the matter before us, as so important a point required to be proved. All this was confessed so frankly, so unhesitatingly, and with so much evident earnestness, as it seemed to me, that I was taken quite by surprise. I began to imagine, that perhaps his own belief in an infallible tribunal was shaking, and that as he so fully surrendered the foundations on which he had built it, he might be disposed to forsake the whole structure itself.

I paused for some moments to give him time to draw his own conclusions, and at least to collect his thoughts; for he seemed confused by the position in which he unexpectedly found himself. After a while I asked,—What farther argument can you adduce, to demonstrate the existence of this infallible tribunal.

He answered “Really I do not just now recollect any other. I thought that these would have been enough.

I said—“But how do you prove to your own mind, how do you at this moment satisfy your own mind, as to the existence of this infallible tribunal?”

He replied—“I have always assumed it,—I have always assumed it,—I have always taken it for granted without further consideration.”

He spoke this with much emotion. I felt for him, for he seemed both confused and humbled; and I would not have pressed him farther, only that I felt I had perhaps a duty to discharge,—a duty to the truth of God,—and a duty to himself, by endeavouring to strengthen any doubts that might possibly have been raised in his mind. I therefore addressed him with much earnestness, and in all the kindness of holy brotherhood, reminding him how he had some moments before told me, that he had abandoned Protestant principles,—forsaking the faith of his fathers,—giving up the creed and religion of his youth, and embraced the whole system of the Church of Rome,—that he had cast all his difficulties and doubts and objections, at the foot of this infallible tribunal ; and had done despite to his former convictions, and done violence to his judgment, and all this in submissive obedience to the decisions of this supposed tribunal : I reminded him also of his having invited me to follow his example, to cease reasoning, to waive objections, to fling all aside and change my church, my religion ; and stake all the interests of time and the destinies of eternity, upon the credit of this infallible tribunal of the Church of Rome, of whose existence or reality he was obliged to acknowledge he had no adequate proof.

He replied with great feeling—"The truth is, I have always assumed it. It never occurred to me in this light before. I have never further questioned it. I have always assumed it."

All this portion of our conversation was marked by great emotion on his part, and I felt it difficult to account for it. My opinions of the controversial skill and acumen of the Jesuits, made me suspect that he was only playing a part, to throw me off my guard, and lead me to express my real hostility to the Church of Rome. I could not understand how a man trained in all the intrigues and subtleties of the College of the Jesuits, and specially selected to argue with and answer my objections, could have broken down so soon, and so easily. And I was therefore undecided as to the character of his emotion. Whether it was the natural emotion of a controversialist, who felt himself foiled when he anticipated an easy victory, or whether it was the emotion of one who had perilled his all for time and eternity, upon a position which he now felt to be untenable, I was at a loss to determine. Perhaps it was not for me to form any opinion. The Lord judgeth the heart. I only know that he expressed himself with great earnestness and emotion, repeatedly placing his hand on his forehead, and repeating the words, “I have always assumed it, I have always taken it for granted.” I did not interrupt the train of his thoughts, whatever they were, but left him under the guidance of Him, who could direct and order all his thoughts to the highest and holiest ends. I felt however that if my friend was sincere, his belief in the Church of Rome was already shaken in its most vital part.

Some visitors were at this moment announced, and our conversation was interrupted for a short time. During the pause he seemed to be collecting his thoughts and recovering himself, and as my object in all my communication with him and others, was not so much to overthrow his positions, and refute his arguments, as to draw him out, so as to learn quietly and unsuspicuously, all he and they had to offer in behalf of the system of Romanism,—as this was my object, learning thus the mode of reasoning and seduction practised on English Protestants, I resumed the subject, and asked him, whether he felt satisfied with merely assuming the existence of an infallible tribunal.

He then said—We can prove its existence, or rather we may assume its existence without proof, in the same way as we assume the existence of God without proof. No man, he continued, can prove the existence of God. It is incapable of proof. Instead of proving it we always assume it ; and in the same way we need not prove the existence of an infallible tribunal, but may assume it without proof.

I replied, that we never assumed the existence of God, except with those who admitted and believed it :—that I could not speak of the practice in the university and schools of theology of Rome ; but that I could answer for the universities and schools of theology in England ; where they would never assume the existence of God, unless with those who believed and acknowledged it. But with the infidels we argued from the things created, to Him who created them. Everything which we see or know has a beginning, and this is not a thing assumed, but a matter of every man's experience. Every created thing, of which we have any experimental knowledge, has or has had a beginning. It must be the result of some cause, and that the result of some previous cause, and that again the result of some still precedent cause ; but still, however unseen, or distant, or untraceable the various links in the chain of cause and effect, there can be no result without a cause, and consequently a First Cause, and this First Cause we call God. Instead, therefore, of assuming the existence of the First Cause, we prove it. If the existence of an infallible tribunal on earth be parallel to this, it should be proved as clearly.

He at once acknowledged that the cases were not analogous, and he said that he could prove his position from the Scriptures. He observed me smiling at this, and he good-humoredly smiled in return, saying, that he feared we could not arrive at any conclusion from them, as we should be sure to adopt different interpretations of each place ; and that it was necessary we should commence with some point on which we were agreed, and so argue from it,—that the Scriptures were utterly useless for such a purpose, inasmuch as we could not agree amidst the variety of interpretations,—that they were always appealed to by all parties, and so could really decide nothing satisfactorily, and therefore he suggested that we were agreed on “ the Apostles’ Creed,” and could argue from it.

I said that as he would not argue from the Holy Scriptures, on the ground of there being different interpretations or explanations of each place, I feared that there might be the same objection to the Apostles’ creed ; as we were as likely to differ in our interpretation or explanation of it. But I added that I would be glad to hear him on the subject.

He argued from the words :—“ I believe in the Holy Catholic Church,” saying, that the words implied that the Catholic Church was one,—that there was a oneness or unity in it ; that there were not many, but one,—that this oneness or unity required that it should have only one head, to give utterance to the sentiments of the Church ; and that this one head must be the seat of infallibility, as otherwise the Church would become divided instead of united, and many instead of one.

I could not but smile at this reasoning, and wondered where the vis consequentiae was to be found. I said however in reply, that it was the belief of all Protestants that the Church was one in Christ,—that it had not many but one head in Christ,—that it knew and imagined only one infallible expression of truth, namely the Holy Scripture ; and then I asked him,—When you say that the Church being one, must have one mouth-piece to utter her sentiments, where is the vis consequentiae? And when you say that there being this one mouth-piece, proves the existence of an infallible tribunal, where is the vis consequentiae? I appealed to him as one practiced in the system of the schools, practiced in the system of reasoning by syllogism, whether such reasoning was admissible, and whether he could justly draw such an inference from my believing that Christ has a Holy and Universal Church,—a “Holy Catholic Church.”

He exhibited on this, as indeed all through our previous conversation, the same apparent candor, as if he was conversing upon a topic on which he felt indifferent, and not at all as if he sought or contemplated my conversion to Romanism. He acknowledged that his argument from the words of the creed, “the Holy Catholic Church,” was inconclusive and unsatisfactory, not calculated to convince: I therefore asked him whether he thought he could prove his position by any other process.

He replied by saying, that he thought he should be able to prove, that the existence of an infallible tribunal was not inconsistent with Scripture, or with History, or with Tradition, or with Reason.

I said, that this could not satisfy me, as the existence of the tribunal must first be proved. Its existence must first be established, and then its consistency or inconsistency with these may be in a way of being debated. I therefore again asked him to prove it.

He then said that he did not at that moment recollect any further argument.

I then reminded him, that he had frankly admitted that he had failed in each of the arguments he had already adduced,—that he had withdrawn every one of them, so that we were still as we were at the beginning ; therefore I asked him for some new and additional argument.

He said that he had advanced all he had recollect ed ; that he had thought that these would have sufficed, but that he must admit that he had failed.

I then asked—Am I to understand that you forsook your Protestant principles, and laid all your scruples and objections and difficulties,—and you have told me they were many and great,—at the feet of this infallible tribunal ; when, as you now admit, you have had no conclusive and satisfactory argument to prove even the existence of such a tribunal ! Have you not taken a step of tremendous importance on very inadequate grounds,—grounds that certainly do not justify a course of such overwhelming importance ?

He replied thoughtfully as before. “ I have always assumed it, I have always taken it for granted.”

I then again asked him, whether it was possible he could not produce any stronger proof for the existence of this infallible authority in the Church of Rome ;—since it was the position on which he based all his professed belief,—that it was the ground on which he asked me to change my Church and faith ; and that it ought therefore to be established by clear and cogent and irrefragable arguments. A man ought not to change his religion or Church on slight grounds. I said that I was indifferent to the common arguments on the subject, as they were in all controversial works, and might there be read by every one ; but that I should be glad—and that I was anxious, to hear what those arguments were, which were still influencing his own mind. He had professed a belief in this infallible authority; —I asked him on what grounds he then believed it.

He answered at once.—He had always been in the habit of assuming it. He had never questioned it, or thought of it in the way in which it had now been considered. A belief in it had been habitual with him. He had always taken it as proved, and he had never questioned it; but, he added thoughtfully, after a pause, “I must consider the subject,—I must reconsider it.”

The tone and manner in which this fell from him made me pause. The well-known character of all connected with the order of the Jesuits, made me wonder at the want of talent, subtlety, and argument so apparent in the part he had taken in this conversation. I had been prepared to see an able, ingenious, and perhaps profound controversialist. I had anticipated this, from all I had ever read and heard of the Jesuits, and especially those who were selected to deal with the Anglican clergy; and I was conscious of feeling some degree of trepidation, in the prospect of measuring lances with such opponents. But here was a man withdrawing his arguments, confessing their inadequacy and invalidity, and acknowledging that he had only habitually assumed the existence of infallibility in the Church of Rome! I was very far from being prepared for this; and I must candidly confess it, I did not believe the sincerity of it. It had frequently occurred to me, that as he had once been a Protestant,—as he seemed from some things that dropped from him, as to his private affairs and his past life, to feel himself under more controul at Rome than he liked,—he would readily avail himself of a good excuse for again changing his religion and Church ; and would fly to England, if encouragement and support were ensured to him. This idea had several times occurred to my wife and myself ; especially to her, to whom he had spoken much as to his private history ; so that I thought at some moments that he either could not conscientiously or would not willingly maintain his argument against me ;—I felt perplexed. I sometimes thought that he might be a very honest but misguided man, who had never fairly considered the matter, and was now for the first time opening his eyes. And then again I feared it might be the ruse of some subtle and accomplished Jesuit, endeavouring by this appearance of candor to throw me off my guard, and thus ascertain whether my real object was to consider these questions, or to attempt to raise doubts in the minds of the priests at Rome. I felt that if I gave them reason to suppose, that I was making any attempt at proselytising, I should immediately be ordered by the police to leave Rome ; and I therefore found it difficult to determine how to deal with him. I resolved at last to be silent. I felt that enough had been said to make an honest man reflect, and that if he were only playing the Jesuit with me, my best course was the appearance of indifference, in order to foil his purpose. I therefore turned from the subject, and did not again revert to anything theological for some time.

After a conversation upon several topics connected with our friends at Rome, I resumed our subject.

I said we had argued hitherto only as to the existence of an infallible tribunal, and there was a further point on which I was anxious for information, and would be glad to know his opinion ; I alluded to the locality or residence of this infallibility. I said the point presented considerable difficulties to my mind. I did not know where to find it. If once I left the Holy Scriptures I did not know where to go ; and even assuming that an infallible tribunal existed somewhere, I yet could not avail myself of it, for I knew not where to find it,—in the fathers,—in tradition,—in councils,—in popes,—in the church diffused—I knew not where or to whom I should go. Now assuming its existence somewhere, I asked his opinion as to whether it could be found in the writings of the fathers.

His answer was—Certainly not.

I said that in this I agreed with him ; that I had read a good many of their writings,—that some of them were undoubtedly master-minds,—that there were some beautiful things in them ; but that there were also many things of a very different character, indeed highly objectionable ; some things wrong, some things puerile, some things in one father opposed to other fathers, and even some parts of the same father opposed to other portions of his own writings, so that on the whole they seemed to me a very mistaken and uncertain authority, on which no thinking man could depend.

He answered by stating his entire concurrence in this sentiment ; saying frankly, that he had not read much of the fathers ; but that from what he had read, with the exception of St. Augustine, there seemed to him much of weakness, much of puerility, much of positive error, though at the same time, mixed with much talent, piety and learning ; but certainly unworthy of the position in which some theologians seemed disposed to place them ; and whatever good was in their writings, they were wholly unfit for the uses to which some would apply them, as authoritative interpreters of Scripture, or indeed as authoritative on any question of theology.

I expressed myself as glad that we were so far agreed, and could thus lay aside the fathers, adding that they themselves justified and recommended our doing so, by the manner in which they treated each other, confuting and opposing one another.

He added that St. Augustine had said, that he would not believe anything merely on the ground that it had been taught by any number of fathers; that, as such, the fathers had no authority with St. Augustine; “and why,” he asked, “why should they have authority with us?”

I perceived that we were agreed thus far, and I therefore added that the fathers not only rejected each other’s authority, but also the authority of Councils and Churches, and demanded submission to the Holy Scriptures, pointing to them, as is usual among Protestants, as to the only seat of infallible truth.

He quickly contradicted me in this, and said that the fathers did not reject the decisions of Councils or Churches.

I was prepared for this, and replied by saying, I would let St. Augustine speak for himself, and opening a volume which I had purposely with me, read the following passage from that father. “I ought not to adduce the council of Nice, nor ought you to adduce the council of Ariminum; for I am not bound by the authority of one, nor are you bound by the authority of the other. Let the question be determined by the authority of the Scriptures, which are witnesses peculiar to neither of us, but common to both.” (Con. Max. 3. c. 14.) I said this was a very clear rejection of the authority of councils, the more remarkable as the council of Nice was one of them.

He remarked that he had not recollected the passage.

I then called his attention to another, where St. Augustine says, “ We do not say that you ought to believe us, that we are in the Church, because Optatus or Ambrose have praised the Church which we hold, nor because other innumerable bishops of our communion have done the same, nor because our Church has been proclaimed by councils of our colleagues, nor because wonderful miracles of hearing and healing have been wrought in those places where our communion is frequented : ” and a little afterwards, he adds,—“ Laying aside all such arguments, let them prove their Church if they can, not in the discourses or reports of the Africans, nor in the councils of their bishops, nor in the writings of any controversialist whatever, nor by miracles and wonders, which are liable to deceit, and against which we have been forewarned and cautioned by the words of our Lord. But let them prove it in the Law, in the predictions of the Prophets, in the songs of the Psalmist, in the words of the Shepherd himself, in the preaching and labors of the Evangelists, that is, in all the canonical authorities of the sacred volume.” I added that in these passages from St. Augustine’s treatise De Unitate (c. 16.) he seems to reject the authority of fathers, councils, and churches, and appeals only to the Holy Scriptures ; and “ why ” I asked, “ why should not we follow his example, and examine our different doctrines by the Holy Scriptures, which we acknowledge to be infallible, instead of appealing to anything else ? ”

He replied, that he could not go with me in appealing to the Scriptures ; as the variety of interpretation to which they were liable would be an insuperable difficulty ; and that while he had not distinctly recollect those passages in St. Augustine, yet he had a perfect recollection of that father's expressing himself very differently elsewhere ;— that he recollect a passage in which St. Augustine expresses himself as willing to submit to anything the bishops required, or which their predecessors enjoined, or the councils desired, or the Church demanded,—that it belonged to them to possess and exercise authority ; and that it was our province to submit and obey ; that whether the things were in Scripture or not, if only the bishop or the Church desired it, it was for us to submit and obey. Such was the opinion of St. Augustine, founding the practice of infant baptism on the simple ground of its being ordered, not by Scripture, but by the Church ; and stating that any resistance to the authority of the bishop or the Church, was an act of rebellion. He added that though he did not recollect at the moment where those opinions of St. Augustine were, he yet had a perfect recollection of having read them in his writings.

I said that I quite believed such sentiments were to be found in the writings of that Father, and that I could myself fully enter into them,—that they seemed to me to relate to the ordinary canons, ceremonies, &c, referring to the right conduct of Church matters, which are not touched in Holy Scriptures, and which must be left to the authority of the Church and its officials to arrange. But, I added, “ if you refer this language to matters of doctrine and faith, I cannot go with you, and the conclusion at which we must arrive is this, namely, that as there are different passages in the writings of St. Augustine, expressing different and opposite opinions,—as not only one father can be cited against another father, but as in this instance, a father can be cited against himself, the most reasonable course would be to lay them altogether aside, and certainly not to appeal to them as an infallible tribunal.”

To this he assented, and even went further, saying, that they never were fitted for being an authority in controversies,—that they frequently contradicted and controverted each other,—that they often retracted and confuted themselves and their own writings,—that many of them held positive error,—that though some were saints, there were others who were not saints; and that the writings of the fathers had been made too much of by some theologians, being often too erroneous, too fanciful and too puerile, to secure the respect which was frequently paid to them. For himself, he added, that he certainly could not be influenced by them.

I then asked where, as I must not look to the fathers, where he would direct me in searching for an infallible authority. Whether he would refer me to tradition?

He replied promptly and earnestly, “Most certainly not. Tradition is not a safe or infallible guide.”

I expressed myself pleased, at finding we were thus far agreed, for that though I had a profound respect for tradition, in all that was within its proper and peculiar province, I yet could not ascribe to it a shadow of authority in matters necessary to salvation.

He said that he quite assented to this, and agreed with me thus far as to all that was purely traditional; for although the words which the Apostles preached were quite as authoritative and inspired, and therefore infallible, as the words which the Apostles wrote, yet there was not the same certainty about them. We were not so sure of their identity. Words spoken were too fugitive. The litera scripta was preferable.

I said that he had just expressed the feeling I always entertained on the subject of tradition, for, admitting that the Apostles' preached word was quite as authoritative as the Apostles' written word, yet we were not so sure that we possess the former,—we are not sure that many things are not palmed on them which they never uttered ; that many errors are not fathered on them, which were never begotten by them,—that that which was purely traditional was universally regarded by all acquainted with historical research, as essentially uncertain,—that consequently I was unable to hold anything as necessary to be believed in order to salvation, which was derived only through ecclesiastical tradition ; and that even if more credible than it is, it still would remain too vague and uncertain for any enquiring or thinking person to refer to it, or depend on it as an infallible tribunal.

He stated broadly and strongly that he felt very much with me, and that tradition—notwithstanding all that was said of it—could never govern his mind. He felt it was altogether too vague, too uncertain—so diverse at different ages and in different countries, that he could not understand why it had been made so much of in these controversies. He spoke freely of our divines at Oxford—those whose tendencies were towards the Church of Rome, as exhibited in the “Tracts for the Times,” in the “Ideal of a Church,” in the “Sermon on Tradition,” &c. ; and thought they had made a great mistake in making so much of tradition as they affected to do—that it really had not helped them, except among those ignorant of what tradition really was—that it had rather raised in many minds, suspicions and prejudices against them and their object,—that he deeply regretted and deplored that men, who might have turned the whole Church of England, and brought all the people of England nearer to the Church of Rome, and even into her arms, had lost so noble an opportunity, by exposing their good cause, by making so much of tradition—that many of them in their zeal without knowledge, had acted with the utmost imprudence in their mode of treating the subject—that they ought to have known that tradition could never be established,—that it could easily be shaken, that it was variable and uncertain and debateable in itself,—that with calm minds it could never decide other questions. He dwelt long on this point, and concluded by saying, that he fully agreed with me that there was no infallibility in tradition, although the whole history of the Church, he added, gave evidence that an infallibility existed.

I felt that we had now arrived at an important point in this our conference, and my heart was full of thankfulness, that the Spirit of all truth had thus far prospered me, and given what I thought some measure of success. It was clear that an appeal to the writings of the fathers and to tradition was abandoned, and by mutual consent rejected. I felt myself in this disengaged of much trouble, which I had feared would have been in my way, if he had required of me to enter on that large branch of controversy, which he thus readily abandoned as untenable. And I was at the same time fearful of being led to express myself in any terms, that might awaken his suspicions or alarm him. I feared to say or do anything, that might awaken in his mind a suspicion that I was desiring to create doubts in his mind, and to attempt to proselytise him, or even to lead him to think that I was not merely seeking for information, and to clear my own views, and to learn some answer to my objections, and to have my difficulties removed : but that I was also playing and tampering with him. I much feared creating such an impression, as would lead him to think I was incorrigible as a Protestant, and altogether beyond his hopes of conversion, which would have led to his withdrawal from all further intercourse with me. I was therefore very thankful to find myself freed from all strife or difference about the fathers and tradition, and thus disengaged of a great source of uneasiness. He evidently felt that he could not safely rely on any argument derived from either of these sources, and thus readily abandoned them.

I soon again took the opportunity of reminding him, that at the beginning of our conversation, he had urged me to lay aside all my objections and difficulties and doubts as to transubstantiation, the sacrifice of the mass, the worship of Mary, and other points ; and at once to enter the Church of Rome, laying all these doubts &c., at the foot of infallibility, which had already resolved and settled them. I said that I should now ask him to shew me this infallible tribunal, to tell me where it exists—where I may find it and avail myself of it. There may be, I said to him, a physician able to heal my sickness of the body, but if I know not where to find him, his skill will remain useless to me, and my sickness remains unhealed ; and in the same way, supposing that this infallible tribunal exists somewhere for the solution of my doubts, it will remain utterly useless, unless I know where to find it in order to avail myself of it, and cast my difficulties at its feet. Where is it ?

He answered that it was in the Church speaking by its infallible head—the Pope.

I said that I had always heard that it was somewhere in the Church, but that men differed in the Church of Rome, as to the precise somewhere. One class of her theologians holds that infallibility resides in the popes : A second class maintains that it resides in a council : And a third class asserts that it is not in either of these separately or in both conjointly, but that it resides diffused through the Church generally. I added that these several classes of theologians always seemed to me to argue very ably in proving that their adversaries are wrong, but to reason very weakly and defectively, when endeavouring to establish their own views ; and I therefore expressed a wish to learn to which of these systems his judgment inclined.

He answered my enquiry by saying, that the French Divines held that infallibility resides in general councils, and not in the popes—that the Italian Divines hold, that it resides in the popes, and not in councils ; and that the ancient Catholics of England used to side with the Italians in favour of the popes, but that the modern Catholics of that island have passed over to the opinions of the French in favor of councils. He added for himself, that he held it was in the popes.

I said in reference to his own views, that I rather coinciled with him, not indeed in thinking that infallibility existed anywhere but in the Holy Scriptures, which were inspired of God, and therefore infallible, but that if it could exist anywhere else—in any of the three seats or parties to which we had referred, the preponderance of argument seemed to me to be decidedly in favor of the papacy. Most of their arguments, I said, seemed to me to be derived from something connected with St. Peter—derived from some word spoken to him, or some promise made to him, or some supremacy supposed to be in him ; and therefore they all seemed to me to point to something in the popes as succeeding him, rather than to anything in councils.

He expressed himself as much pleased and gratified, at finding I agreed with him on that point, as it was one on which his order—that of the Jesuits—held very decided opinions.

I then said, that though my impression was, that in the question of councils, bishops, and popes, the arguments rather inclined in favor of the claim of the popes, yet, supposing that point settled, and all difficulty removed from my mind on that point, there was a further difficulty immediately called into existence—namely, how it was to be ascertained when the pope delivered himself infallibly. It was admitted, I said, by all parties, that some popes had erred—that some were heretical—and that even in the case of orthodox popes, they sometimes spoke fallibly, and sometimes infallibly. There are many papal bulls, delivered ex cathedra of course, which were directly opposite and contradictory to other papal bulls, also delivered ex cathedra. And under these admitted circumstances, the difficulty pressing on my mind, would be the means or test by which I could distinguish between the fallible bulls, and the infallible bulls.

He replied, that that was a very difficult part of our enquiries, and that he thought it would be advisable for me to have a conference, or meeting with the professor of canon law—that he was one of the order of the Jesuits—that he was from the nature of his professorship, peculiarly competent to give me information on that precise point,—that he was very learned and talented, and had paid great attention to that department of ecclesiastical matters ; and finally, that in a few days he should arrange for a conversation on the subject, informing the reverend professor of my difficulties, that he might be prepared before-hand to give all information and satisfaction to my enquiries.

Soon after this, with friendly and mutual expressions of a hope, that we might again soon meet to speak for our mutual edification on these deeply interesting matters, we parted.

CHAPTER V.

THE DEATH OF A CONVERT—ADMINISTRATION OF FIVE SACRAMENTS—PRAYER THROUGH MARY HEARD SOONER THAN THROUGH CHRIST—ARGUMENT FROM EXPERIENCE—THE MADONNA OF THE AUGUSTINIANS—THE MEANS BY WHICH SAINTS HEAR PRAYERS—GOD A MEDIATOR OF THE SAINTS—OPINIONS OF ST. CHRYSOSTOM—THE INFLUENCE OF THE WORSHIP OF MARY—MARY MORE COMPASSIONATE THAN CHRIST.

IT was not many days after the preceding interview, that another priest of the Church of Rome called on us. He was a man of considerable attainments, and singularly accomplished in some particulars. He held a position of great influence in the Church, and his learning and character added yet more if possible to the influence derived from his station. He came with the frank avowal of his object—namely to attempt our conversion to the Church of Rome. He felt, I believe, a very sincere regard for us, and would have made any sacrifice to accomplish what appeared to him so desirable a result. But at the same time, I felt that great caution was required on my part—that a word from him could send me at a moment's notice from Rome—and that wisdom and prudence demanded that I should rather endeavour to draw out his opinions—to get at his method of reasoning with Protestants—to learn all he had to offer —that I should rather endeavour to do this than to declare my own opinions, and so by openly opposing him, expose myself to the danger of being sent from Rome. I believed him to be really our friend, but I feared lest I should make him as really our enemy.

We soon fell into conversation on the subject.

It commenced by his asking me, how I thought he had been occupied during the amusements of the carnival—how I supposed he had been engaged ; adding that he had taken no part in the ordinary amusements of the season.

To this enquiry I had no reply to offer, and therefore merely said, that it was to be presumed he was occupied with something more suited to his sacred office.

He immediately rejoined with much complacency, accompanied by some pride and joy—that sort of feeling very general among them, when they have performed what is called “a good work”—that he had been engaged in receiving a Protestant into the bosom of the Church of Rome.

I was very far from feeling any complacency at this announcement, and I was anxious to learn which of my countrymen was the unhappy victim. I could not understand how any one seeing the realities of Romanism at Rome, could ever be persuaded to join the system ; so, resolving to watch my opportunity, and seeing he had some object in introducing the subject, I left him to himself, merely remarking that I thought he had been very naturally occupied.

He then told the circumstances with much simplicity, that the man was dying—that he had no relatives near him—that one of his companions had talked much to him about sending for a priest—that he had never avowed any wish on the subject of religion, or of a priest,—that as he was near death, my friend as a priest went to the bedside of the man,—that he found him so far gone as to be speechless—that he therefore stated to him that he would kneel down and offer a prayer for him. His words were “ He was speechless ; so I said I would kneel down and say one of my prayers for him. I then immediately knelt down and said the ‘ Hail Mary,’ the ‘ Ave Maria.’ ”

I was perfectly astonished, and could not repress the expression of my intense astonishment that at such a moment, when an immortal soul was passing into eternity —when all the awful accompaniments of death were around him, he could think of offering such a sentence, for prayer it was not, as the “ Hail, Mary ! ” I repeated the words of the “ Ave Maria, ” and asked how it was possible that he had no word to offer—no counsel to give—no message of forgiveness to announce—no gospel of salvation to preach ? how it was possible that instead of praying to Christ for forgiveness, praying to the Spirit for grace, praying to God for salvation, he could only have offered these words of worship to the Virgin Mary ? I was deeply moved at what appeared to me, a frightful neglect of the eternal interests of the dying man ; and did not hesitate to express myself strongly, as to the fearful responsibility he had incurred.

He seemed not to have heard me, as if he was absorbed in his own thoughts, so that my words were lost on him ; and he said with eagerness that he had observed as he knelt and said the “ Hail Mary ! ” that the dying man moved his lips as if secretly repeating the words after him, for being speechless he could not repeat the words openly ; and that he said to the dying man, “and can you repeat that prayer after me?” For, he said, addressing himself to me, “there is nothing against which the feelings and prejudices of Protestants are more strong and enduring than against praying to the Holy Virgin, so,” he added, “I felt that when the dying man could join me in that prayer to the Holy Virgin, he must have been very far gone towards us.”

“Very far gone indeed!” I replied.

“Yes,” he continued, “He seemed to repeat the prayer after me, and feeling he must have gone very far towards us, I asked him farther whether he could not join our Church in all the rest. He shewed by his manner that he could, and that he wished to be received into our Church; so I heard his confession and gave him absolution.”

At this I was on the point of asking my priestly friend, whose tone and manner was exulting in the highest degree, how he could hear the confessions of a man who was speechless? and how a speechless man could utter his confession? but I checked myself on recollecting that according to their canons, he was justified in exhorting the man to make confession, and then in assuming a confession to have been made in such cases, where the person is too far gone to be able to speak; so I was silent.

He proceeded to say, that after having thus confessed and absolved the dying man, there arose a doubt as to whether the man had ever been baptized; and though baptism must never be repeated, yet, as Protestants were very careless in administering baptism, it was felt safe to give conditional baptism to such converts. It was so customary he said, among the Protestant Churches to baptize without properly pouring the water on the child, that there was no certainty that there was a real baptism ; and though they could not think of repeating baptism, yet they always gave conditional baptism, in such cases to converts. “And in this way,” he added, “I baptised the man conditionally, and then I had him immediately confirmed, and he received the communion, and then the extreme unction, and thus he received almost at once no less than five sacraments ! ”

He spoke this in a tone of exultation and triumph, as if some great and good achievement had been accomplished. I must confess that I was amused, notwithstanding the sadness of his statement, and the solemnity of the subject. It seemed so strange a proceeding for a man, a minister of Christ at the bed of a dying man, merely to offer as a prayer the “Hail Mary,”—it seemed so simply said that when a protestant prays to the Virgin Mary, he must be very far gone,—it seemed so necessary to apologise for re-baptizing a protestant—it seemed so absurd to speak of a speechless man, making a confession of his sins so as to receive absolution ; and above all it seemed so inconsistent with all our views of true religion, to regard it as necessary, and even to make a boast of it, that this speechless man had in so short a time received the five sacraments—penance—baptism—confirmation—communion—extreme unction !

And then to crown all, he told me in reply to my enquiry, touching what Protestant Church the man had belonged to, that he was a Swiss, one of the soldiers of the pope’s troops ! I felt that a poor Swiss mountaineer sent to Rome in his youth, as a soldier in the pope’s guard, living all his life at Rome, and at last dying and speechless in a foreign land, and with a foreign tongue—I felt that the scene was scarcely one for my friend to boast of. It was one to awaken sadness of heart and mournful feeling. The narrative however, was one that gave me the opportunity of introducing an enquiry, on a subject on which I was anxious to have some information.

I asked why, on so solemn an occasion as a death-bed, when an immortal soul was about passing into the presence of God—Why did you pray to the Virgin Mary instead of praying to Jesus Christ? In common with all protestants I would have prayed to Jesus Christ, or to God through Jesus Christ.

He answered—that it was their opinion—the opinion too of many of the Fathers, that God hears our prayers more quickly when they are offered through the blessed Virgin, than when offered through any one else.

I had anticipated this answer, owing to some things previously communicated to me from another person; and in order to draw him out to an explanation of this doctrine, I merely said that I could not see how it was possible for him to justify such an opinion.

He replied that there was warrant in Scripture to justify it, for there was in the book of Revelations, a vision in which the elders are described as offering odours, which are said to be the prayers of the saints; so that it was clear that the saints offered prayers for us.

I reminded him, that “saints” was always the Scripture name of Christians; not dead but living Christians; and that “elders,” that is “presbyters,” describe the ministry of the Church; and therefore that the vision of the elders offering the prayers of saints, represented the ministry of the Church offering the prayers of the living Christians. In all this there was nothing to justify his praying to Mary. The vision described the elders offering the prayers of saints on earth, and did not justify our praying to saints in heaven. And after all, I asked, how such a vision could justify his saying the "Hail Mary," at the bed of the dying man, and also justify his statement that God hears the prayers offered through the Virgin Mary, more quickly than those offered to Christ.

He remained silent.

I therefore asked, how he supposed those persons whom he regarded as saints in heaven, heard the prayers of men on earth, and how he could justify the practice of praying to them for this intercession, assistance or anything else ?

He said that it was not a practice or duty obligatory on them—that it was not enjoined or commanded by the Church, that it was only recommended as good and wholesome, at least it was so recommended by the council of Trent. And therefore this belief was not necessary to communion with the Church.

I replied that that was true in theory, but not in practice ; for by making these prayers to saints part and parcel of the public liturgy of the Church, so that no man could join in her services without joining in these prayers to the saints, she practically compelled the thing. But, I added, since the Council of Trent declared the practice to be good and wholesome, it would be well that some reasons or proofs could be adduced to justify the statement.

He answered promptly, that the argument from experience was decisive. He then paused for a moment, as if recollecting himself, and then went on to say that it was the experience of good catholics, that when they prayed to the blessed Virgin their prayers were answered. Many and many a time, he said, when a godly mother prayed for her ungodly son, who was wandering in the way of sin and shame—praying that he might be brought back to repentance and holiness—when a mother thus prayed to the blessed Virgin for her son, she finds that sooner or later her prayer is answered—that her son is brought back repentant and holy ; and connecting this with the blessed Virgin, who was herself a mother and able to sympathize with a mother, she recognizes it as the answer of the Virgin to her prayers, and is therefore encouraged to pray to her again. He continued to say, that it was the same in praying to other saints. When praying to them for any particular object, for recovery from sickness—for deliverance from any trouble—for the conversion of a beloved child—or indeed for any object of prayer generally ; when praying thus to a saint for these, it is often found by experience, that the prayer is fulfilled and the object granted, and this experience induces them to pray again and again to the saints.

I had never heard this argument before, at least in this form, so to prevent all mistake I asked particularly whether his argument was not one simply derived from experience—experience of answer to such prayers. He at once answered in the affirmative, adding that experience proved to be their best encouragement ; and when I remarked that there was no point more liable to be mistaken, than the supposed connection between prayers and events ; and that as it was God who alone could dispose and order events, so it was to him alone our prayers should be offered, he did not seem to heed or to hear me, but went on with his own argument.

He said that many persons had been converted through this method of prayer, through prayer to the blessed Virgin and the saints; and thus experience of the truth asserted by the Council of Trent, that it was good and wholesome, proved a great encouragement as well as strong argument for it. And the more so, as the feeling of devotion to the Virgin has a mysterious something in it, which will ever linger about the heart of the man who has ever felt it. It is one of those feelings which once admitted, can never afterwards be totally obliterated. There it still clings around the heart, and though there may be coldness to all other religious impressions—though there may be infidelity or even scorn as to all our faith—though there may be the plunging into the wild vortex of every sin, yet still there will not unfrequently be found even among the very worst of our people, a lingering feeling of devotion to the blessed Virgin. It is as a little thread that still keeps hold of the soul, and it will yet draw him back. All else may be broken, but this thread, by which the blessed Virgin holds him, still clings to his soul. Even in the most wild, wicked, and desperate men—even among the bandits in their worst state, there is always retained this devotion to Mary; and when we cannot get at their hearts in any other way—when every other argument or truth or principle or feeling of religion fails to make any impression, we frequently find access opened to their hearts, by this one feeling still lingering about them; and thus we find by experience that a devotion to the blessed Virgin, proves often the means by which we are able to lay hold of their hearts, and win them back to our holy religion.

I said that I had frequently heard of this devotion to the Virgin, as characteristic of some of the very worst persons in Italy—that after renouncing God, the Father, Son and Spirit—after surrendering every element of Christianity and devotion to Christ, they still sometimes retained this devotion to the Virgin Mary. I said that to my poor judgment such a state of things, instead of being an argument in favor of this devotion to Mary, was really its greatest condemnation. It was as if a life of sin and vice was felt to be inconsistent with a devotion to Christ, but at the same time perfectly compatible with a devotion to Mary. It was as if they felt they could not retain both Christ and sin, but that they could retain both Mary and sin. This at least was the apparent reasoning of such persons, and certainly it was the plain matter of fact, as implied by what had just been stated to be the experience of the Church. At all events, I added, it seems to imply that the Virgin Mary is more accessible, more lenient, more loving to the poor sinner, than Jesus Christ.

He repeated what he had before said on this point expressive of the greater leniency, the gentler compassion and the closer sympathies of Mary; adding that he was borne out in such an opinion, by that of the Fathers, of whom many were of opinion that even Christ himself was not so willing to hear our prayers, and did not hear them so quickly, when offered simply to himself, as when they were offered through the blessed Virgin.

I felt that this was a hideous sentiment, and could not forbear to say so, adding that when such opinions were circulated by the priesthood, I could no longer feel surprised at the extent—the extravagance to which the devotion to Mary had gone in Rome—that I felt the whole devotional system of the Church of Rome, the prayers unceasingly offered to the Virgin, the innumerable pictures of the Virgin, the countless images of the Virgin, the many churches dedicated to the Virgin, the universal devotion rendered to the Virgin, the manner in which all the services and prayers of the Church and people are impregnated with thoughts of the Virgin—the extent to which in conversation all classes went in speaking of the Virgin, all had impressed me with the feeling that the religion of Italy ought to be called the religion of the Virgin Mary, and not the religion of Jesus Christ.

I added that it was impossible to justify such a state of things. “If” said I, “I enter the Church of the Augustines, I see there an image of the Virgin Mary as large as life. Some are decorating her with jewels as votive offerings—some are suspending pictures around her as memorials of thankfulness—some are placing money in a box at her feet—some are prostrate in profound devotion before her—some are devoutly kissing her feet and touching them with their foreheads—some are repeating the rosary before her as if acceptable to her—all turning their backs upon the consecrated Host, turning their backs upon that which the priest is elevating at the High Altar, and which he and they believe to be Jesus Christ himself bodily and visibly among them—turning their backs upon Christ, and turning their faces to Mary, practically forsaking Christ for Mary, with a prostration the most profound before her Image—a prostration that was never surpassed in the days of heathen Rome, and can never be justified in Christian Rome."

He said in answer to all this, that for his own part he would not act thus, and that it was not right to judge of the Church by the devotions of the ignorant.

My wife then interposed, and said she had witnessed all this, and was shocked at what seemed to her to be a most fearful idolatry, for while the priest was saying mass and elevating the Host at one end of the Church, and some of the people bowing before it, the Image of Mary stood at the other end, and some of the people were in precisely the same way bowing before it. Some preferred what they believed to be Christ ;—others preferred what they regarded as an image of the Virgin.

He replied with much gentleness that he never prayed to the Virgin of the Angustines—that it was not a slighty image—that it was really an ugly image, and had never excited his devotion, and in fact he had never prayed before it ; but still he thought it scarcely fair to speak against this devotion to Mary as exhibited by the more ignorant, inasmuch as they had learned its value by experience. Many of those whom we had witnessed there, had no doubt offered many a prayer to her and had found an answer. Many a mother praying for her child had obtained her petition. They were poor people, subject to privations, afflictions, siecknesses, and they found relief and consolation in going to the blessed Virgin.

He said all this in a manner embarrassed and hesitating, as if feeling he must say something, but as having no confidence in his own words ; and when, observing this, I reminded him that these poor people ought to have been directed to Him who is “the Father of mercies and the God of all consolation,” he seemed to feel the truth of it, but was silent.

After a few words shewing the true source of relief and consolation in all our distresses and afflictions, I went on to say that there could be no answer from the Virgin Mary, inasmuch as she could not hear the prayers that were offered to her. I asked—How does the Virgin Mary hear the prayers of men? How do the saints hear our prayers?

He looked at me as if he had never thought of the point before,—as if the enquiry had never occurred to him before. He said nothing.

I therefore proceeded to state clearly the point involved in my question. I said, that as the Godhead from its very nature was omnipresent and omniscient, it was easy to understand God’s hearing our prayers, and knowing our devotion of heart. He could know our feelings, our wishes, our wants, our sufferings, our prayers. But the Virgin Mary was not omnipresent or omniscient;—the other saints were not omnipresent or omniscient, and as neither she nor they could read the secret depths of the human heart, so it was not easy to understand how they could hear or know the prayers that were offered to them. It should be recollected that one man prays to the Virgin Mary in London, a second prays to her in China, a third in America, &c. It seems hard to conceive, how she can hear and know the prayers offered thus by different persons in London, in China, in America, &c. It seems difficult to understand, how she or any saint in heaven can know the wishes, the thoughts, the devotion, the prayers of the millions, who are praying to them in so many different parts of the world at the same time. If she or they were omnipresent—if omniscient as the Godhead, all would be easy to conceive, all would be intelligible; but as they are no more than finite creatures in heaven, this cannot be. I asked therefore—how can Mary—how can any Saint in heaven hear the multitudes of prayers from the multitude of hearts on earth?

He said in reply that they were spirits; that they were not like us on earth, but spiritual beings in heaven. He spoke as if the difficulty had never occurred to his mind in its strength before—as if he really thought that, from their being not corporeal but spiritual, everything was easy.

I reminded him that their being spirits, embodied or disembodied, did not affect the question. They were finite spirits, and therefore could not pervade the infinite. They were not omnipresent. They were not omniscient. They were only spirits, and not God, who alone knoweth the heart, and therefore alone knoweth prayer.

I have seldom seen a man, habituated to controversy, more perplexed than my friend appeared at this question, touching the means by which Mary or the saints could hear and know our prayers. For a moment he seemed disposed to think it might be some privilege in the possession of such spirits, but after some hesitation and acknowledgment of the difficulties the question raised, he threw out, in the way of suggestion, that it might perhaps be that God reveals it to them—that being in God's presence they learn it from Him.

I remarked that this was no more than a suggestion—a mere perhaps—a supposed possibility. It was not a settled fact on which a system could be based, and therefore it was wholly inadequate to justify so grave a practice.

He said at once that he did not just at that moment recollect any other way, in which our prayers or hearts could be known to the blessed Virgin, or the blessed saints.

I therefore said that his suggestion, though as good as any other of which I had read or heard, defeated the whole object of the practice. The practice of invoking Mary and the other saints, was taught on the principle that men ought not to approach God directly or immediately, but indirectly through these as his favorites, even as we would approach an earthly sovereign through his courtiers.

He at once assented to this.

I therefore added, that if the prayers and aspirations of votaries are not heard or known to the saints until God reveals them to them,—until they learn them through Him, then the prayers and aspirations must first go to God, and afterwards to the saints—must in short go directly and immediately to God, and indirectly and mediately to the saints. This utterly subverts the whole system, which is based upon the opposite idea. It supposes that the prayer first reaches God—that He reveals it to the saint—that the saint then prays it back again to God, presenting to Him the petition of the votary; and thus according to this system, God is our mediator to the saints, and not the saints our mediators to God.

He said that they did not regard the saints as mediators of redemption, but only as mediators of intercession, who were to intercede with God for us.

I replied that I was fully aware of the distinction, but that it rather strengthened my argument ; for as their province was to present our prayers to God, and to intercede with God to hear and grant our prayers, so it was especially essential to them as intercessors, that they should hear our prayers, and know our hearts. "You," I added, "make the Virgin Mary and the saints mediators of prayer. It is necessary therefore that they be able to hear our prayers ; and the only explanation you give is a suggestion which makes God our mediator of prayer to the saints, instead of the saints being mediators of prayer to God."

He evidently had nothing farther to offer. He saw the difficulty, and after some hesitation, from which I was not disposed to extricate him, being in hopes of having raised a doubt or at least a question in his mind, that might work there hereafter, he said—that at all events the Council of Trent had not commanded the practice.

To this I said, that the point for him and for me to consider for our own soul's sake, was not whether the Council of Trent commanded it or not. There could be no question as to the fact, that the thing was practised ; and though it was attempted to justify it, by saying we should approach an earthly sovereign through his courtiers or favorites, and ought in the same way to seek access to the King of heaven ; yet, when it is considered that, according to his system, we must first make our petition known to the king, and then the king must make it known to his courtiers, or favorites ; and then they must tell it back again to the king—when it is considered that his suggestion requires such a parallel as this, it must be felt that it requires no elaborate refutation.

be revolving in his mind how he best could escape it. But although he exhibited a desire to find an answer, as if anxious to gain a controversial victory rather than to attain a truth, I yet felt that the difficulty might, by the blessing of divine grace, give birth to other difficulties; and so shaking his confidence in the imagined impregnability of his Church, might lead eventually to farther and fresh enquiry. I could not expect that anything that I could offer, especially under the peculiar circumstances and manner in which I was obliged to state my views, could have any lasting effect on his mind, especially as I could so seldom give expression to my argument as if it were my own deep feeling; but only as a suggestion, as to what might possibly be the impression on the minds of others. But I also felt much encouragement, for I knew I was acting for the best, and that it was my duty to leave the result, in a spirit of prayer and faith, with Him who orders all things according to the councils of his own will. In this feeling therefore, when I observed him perfectly perplexed, I pressed the difficulty in another form.

I added, that I could not see how the practice could be "good and profitable," inasmuch as it lay on the verge of idolatry. Without saying that it was idolatry in the strict sense of the word, there were many who could scarcely see how they could avoid idolatry, for there was no certainty as to the real sanctity of these saints—there were many enrolled in the canon of saints, of whose title to that pre-eminence there was no great evidence—at all events no very satisfactory or certain evidence. In short, no man on earth could speak with certainty, as to the persons who are saints in heaven. There were many persons who had no faith in the process of canonization—no confidence in the process of examination before canonization—no assurance of the genuine sanctity of the persons canonized—even more, who believed that some of those supposed saints were in a far worse region than heaven ; and thus the praying to them might prove to be praying to devils, instead of saints, and so be the very worst species of idolatry.

He said, that though my objection might hold so far as absolute certainty was required, yet that there was moral certainty as to the sanctity of those who were enrolled or canonized as saints, and he thought that moral certainty was sufficient in such a case—that we might reasonably and safely proceed on moral certainty ; but that at all events, men might pray to the Virgin and the Apostles, as there could be no doubt as to their sanctity.

I replied that this objection did not apply to them, but to St. Dominic, St. Francis, St. Thomas à Becket, and some others. St. Dominic was remarkable as the most ferocious of persecutors, St. Francis as the inventor of superstitions, and St. Thomas as the disturber of kingdoms—that the argument applied to such saints as they ; but that the objection, so far as the Virgin and the Apostles were concerned, was that drawn from the impossibility of their hearing the prayers that were offered to them.

He paused a moment, and then stated that the ancient Fathers of the Church recommended the practice.

I replied by saying, that it was very true that some of the fathers seemed to recommend the practice, but it was equally true that some others of them as strongly objected against it—that the most diverse and opposite passages might be cited from them upon the point, not only from different fathers, but even from the same father,—his writings in one place being the opposite of his opinions recorded in another ; and I proposed at once to produce passage for passage with him in the library—to produce a passage against the practice for every one he could produce in its support. And I then suggested that if this could be done, the writings of the fathers ought to be laid aside as contradictory, and therefore of no authority on the subject.

He hesitated in his answer to this, but after a moment replied, that the contradictions were only apparent and not real, and could be easily reconciled.

I referred at the instant to St. Chrysostom, where he cites the example of the woman of Canaan, not stopping to pray to the Apostles but going to Christ himself, “ God,” says Chrysostom, “ is always near. If you entreat a man, you must enquire what he is doing and whether he is asleep or at leisure, and perhaps the servant gives no answer. But with God there is nothing of all this. Whenever you go and call on Him, He hears ; with Him there is no want of leisure, no mediator, no servant to keep you off. Mark the wisdom of the woman of Canaan. She does not pray to James. She does not beseech John. She does not fly to Peter ; but she breaks through them all, saying, I want no mediator, but taking repentance as my spokesman, I come to the fountain itself. It was for this He left the heavens, it was for this He became flesh, it was that such as I might have boldness to speak to Himself. I want no mediator ; Have mercy upon me.” I argued that this was language against going to the saints, very different from what my friend had employed on this point.

To this he replied, that he could adduce passages from St. Chrysostom quite as strong in favour of the practice, and that such as I had cited were capable of explanation—that the woman certainly ought not to have gone to St. Peter, or St. James, for that the Lord himself was present. He was there in the flesh, and she ought to have gone to Him at once, and this was all that was designed by St. Chrysostom.

I reminded him, that such an explanation might apply to the fact in the gospel-narrative, but that the argument was not on the gospel-narrative, but on the exhortation of St. Chrysostom. He expressly says, in another place, “When we have a petition to make to men, it is often the case that we cannot go straight to themselves, and speak with them: but it is necessary for us first to procure the favour of their ministers or stewards or officers—but with God it is not thus. There is no need of intercessors of prayer with Him, and He is not so ready to hear our prayers, and answer graciously when we pray through others, as when we come and pray of ourselves to Him.” Now our Lord was not there present, when St. Chrysostom gave this advice to his people, and therefore the explanation does not apply—does not touch the real point of the argument, namely, that St. Chrysostom advises us not to go to the saints, but to go directly to Christ himself.

He avoided this precise point, and went on to say that he could cite places from St. Chrysostom and other fathers that were quite opposite to this; and though there might thus be the appearance of self-contradiction in their writings, yet they could easily be explained by a comparison with other places,—that apparently contradictory passages might be cited in reference to the blessed Trinity—to the Incarnation, &c., that this was particularly true in reference to the use of images, against which there certainly were very strong passages in some of the fathers, but those passages ought to be explained away, instead of being regarded as contradictory, or opposed to images, for it ought not to be supposed that the fathers were opposed to images ; St. Gregory expressly saying that images might be kept for devotion but not for worship, and Epiphanius and others were equally clear.

I reminded him, that when Epiphanius saw a veil or curtain in the Church with a picture on it, he immediately tore it in pieces, and forbade the practice.

He took no notice of this, but added that in the old liturgies there were prayers to the saints, and as liturgies were the truest tests or evidences of the opinion of the Church, so they proved beyond answer the practice of the primitive Churches.

I said in reply to this, that I was under the opposite impression—that I had seen those liturgies, those that go by the names of Basil, Nazianzen, Chrysostom and others ; and never saw prayers to the saints ; that there were express prayers for the Virgin Mary, and the Apostles, and the saints, but not prayers to them ;—that so far as my reading went, it appeared to me that in the ancient liturgies generally, the prayers were for the saints, and in the modern liturgies of Rome, the prayers were to them ; and that this was a plain difference, and one that at all events took away the cogency of what he had stated in reference to the liturgies, and the practice of the primitive churches.

He denied this in a manner that, as it struck me, shewed he either had never before heard my statement, or had at least never examined the subject with much care ; and he seemed to regard his own statement as so certain, as to be beyond contradiction ; so he turned the subject, and reverting to the former point, said that the practice of praying to the Virgin Mary was found to be a holy practice—a practice greatly tending to promote holiness in those that cultivate it. “When,” he said warmly, “we think of the purity and the holiness of the Virgin—when we think of her as selected by God to bear his Son in her womb—when we think of her as the purest and holiest of creatures—the very thought of one so pure and holy, will dissipate every thought of impurity and unholiness—the very thought of one so sinless, will take away every thought of sin. A devotion to the blessed Virgin prevents us from sinning, and a sincere devotion to her is a great safeguard against sin.”

Such a sentiment as this could scarcely be heard unmoved, by any one who loved the Gospel and cherished a feeling for the glory of the Saviour. It was substituting Mary for Christ—substituting the thought and recollection of Mary for the thought and recollection of Christ—substituting the notion of her purity for the reality of his purity, and substituting some fanciful ideas respecting her, for the remembrance of his death and sacrifice and atonement, as a safe-guard against sin. It was a difficulty with which I had often to struggle, in endeavouring to repress the strong and warm expression of my real feelings on such occasions of blasphemy ; for I could scarcely think otherwise of the sentiment. But I was, considering the natural warmth of my nature, greatly restrained and preserved from shewing a decision of feeling, which might have compelled my retirement from Rome.

I therefore merely asked him, though with all the earnestness which I felt, whether if attending the bed of a dying man, he would feel himself justified in speaking to an immortal soul, when about to pass into eternity, and desiring him to fly to Mary—that in all his doubts and perplexities he was to look to Mary—that in all his fears and terrors he was to look to Mary :—I asked whether, considering his responsibility at such a moment, he would address a dying man in language that pointed only to the Virgin Mary and made no mention of Jesus Christ ? I then read the following words from the Roman Breviary.

“ If the winds of temptation arise, if thou run upon the rocks of tribulation, look to the star, call upon Mary. If thou art tossed upon the waves of pride, of ambition, of detraction, of envy, look to the star, call upon Mary. If anger, or avarice, or the temptations of the flesh, toss the bark of thy mind, look to Mary. If disturbed with the greatness of thy sins, troubled at the defilement of thy conscience, affrighted at the horrors of the judgment, thou beginnest to be swallowed up in the gulf of sadness, the abyss of despair, think upon Mary—in dangers, in difficulties, in doubts, think upon Mary, invoke Mary. Let her not depart from thy mouth, let her not depart from thy heart, &c.” I asked him solemnly, whether he would use such language, even though sanctioned by his Breviary, in preparing a dying man for the presence of God in the eternal world.

He replied unhesitatingly that he would, and then went on to argue that experience justified him—that experience proved that the prayers offered to the Virgin were heard and answered—that mothers praying to her who was herself a mother, with all the sympathies of a mother, were heard and answered—that such prayers for children in sin, or in danger, or in sickness, were heard and answered ; and it was this practical experience that proved the great encouragement to the devotion of ourselves to the Virgin Mary. He then went on to say that a Catholic devotion to the blessed Virgin, never interfered with a right devotion to Jesus Christ, but redounded rather to his glory ; but that it required a Catholic heart to see and understand this,—that one who was not a Catholic could not understand it,—that the ignorant often perverted it, going on in sin, under the belief, that by praying to her she will pardon them,—that all this was only the abuse of the system—that the devotion to Mary was a holy devotion, and a source of holiness. If we think of one so pure, so chaste, so holy, the thought will keep us from sin. St. Alphonso de Liguori was a proof of this, so devoted to the blessed Virgin, and so holy in his life. The order of the Jesuits was another illustration. Their devotion to the blessed Virgin is known through the whole world ; and as for their holiness, they have been accused of ambition, of intrigue, of polities, of opposing sovereigns and disturbing the peace of kingdoms, but no one has ever charged them with impurity or immorality. They are a living proof that devotion to the blessed Virgin is conducive to holiness. But, he added, it requires a Catholic heart to comprehend this. To others it may seem dishonoring to Jesus Christ, yet it is not so. The Holy Virgin is never honored above Christ, nor as equal to Christ, but only as His mother, who has a mother's influence over Him ; and thus all the homage and worship paid to her, is really a homage and a worship to Him, inasmuch as it is only as His mother that it is offered to her.

He ran on in this way for some time, and I feared to interrupt him by any attempt at opposing or confuting him. It would have given me the appearance of an opponent rather than a listener ; and when I considered the station and influence of the person with whom I was conversing, I felt particularly anxious not to awaken suspicion, by appearing otherwise than as an inquiring listener.

I therefore said, that I was acquainted with some of the works of the St. Alphonso de Liguori whom he mentioned,—that among other things in his “Glories of Mary,” is the vision of the two ladders extending from earth to heaven—that at the top of one is the Virgin Mary, and at the top of the other is Jesus Christ ;—that all who attempted to enter heaven by the ladder of Jesus Christ fell back and failed, while all who tried the ladder of the Virgin Mary succeeded by her assistance. I mentioned this, as I had already done in conversation with another priest, and I asked whether such language did not exalt the Virgin Mary, not only as equal, but as superior to Jesus Christ—superior in the love and compassion and mercy of a Saviour, as if she was a safer reliance than Jesus Christ ?

He seemed thoroughly vexed and ashamed at this quotation from an author and saint whom he had so highly praised. He hesitated and seemed perplexed for a satisfactory answer ; but at length said, that such language was intended by Liguori, merely to express the love of Mary, and to shew how willingly and how effectually she uses her influence as a mother, in behalf of those devoted to her. He then added, that it was the opinion of many of the fathers and saints, that God hears more quickly the prayers that are offered through the blessed Virgin—that so greatly is she in the love of God, and so great is her influence with God, that the prayers offered through her ascend to heaven more quickly, and are heard and answered more speedily and effectually than otherwise ; and this was probably the meaning of Liguori in the details of the two ladders from St. Bernard—that many sinners are troubled with fears on account of their sins—that surely we all must at times be in fear on account of our many sins—that many such fearful or timid sinners come to Mary instead of Jesus. They feel that she is so merciful, so loving, so willing to save them, that they come to her instead of coming to him—that when they think of Jesus Christ they are afraid.

“Afraid of Jesus !” I exclaimed involuntarily, startled at the idea of Jesus being less attractive, less loving, less merciful than Mary. “Afraid of Jesus, who died for them—who shewed his love in dying for them, and yet not afraid of Mary, who never professed or shewed any love for them !”

He immediately checked himself, and looked suspiciously and enquiringly at me.

I feared I had shewn my feeling too plainly, and therefore in the hope of turning the subject, asked him to explain the vision of the two ladders on his principles.

He said expressively, that he had already explained the doctrine of the Church—that as our Lord on the cross desired John to behold his mother, and that disciple obeyed and took her to his own home, so he was a type of the Church, which is in like manner ever to look on Mary as its mother; and therefore the Church respects her, loves her, serves her, and venerates her as its mother, to whom as a child, she comes for comfort, consolation, grace and assistance in every time of need.

I replied, that our Lord on the cross desired the Virgin Mary to look on the beloved disciple John, as if he were her son, instead of Him now dying on the cross: and then desired the beloved disciple John to look on Mary, now bereaved and desolate, as if she were his own mother, and to take care of her as such. And the narrative states, that John acting on this, took Mary to his own home, and thus complied with the dying wishes of Jesus Christ. "But," I added, "how does this prove the moral of the two ladders, and those seeking heaven through Mary, succeeding and being saved, while those seeking heaven through Jesus Christ, fail in the effort?"

He replied that he was unwilling to argue further—that he had stated the doctrine of the Church—that that doctrine in honouring Mary, was not dishonouring to Christ—that it was a subject on which, as on that of Images and Pictures, there was much that was misunderstood, and that it required "a Catholic heart" to understand it rightly.

He thus broke off the conversation.

NOTE.

The statements and arguments of my reverend opponent respecting the worship or invocation of the Virgin Mary are remarkable. I endeavoured to give them correctly and faithfully. But I did not anticipate that the correctness and fidelity of my narrative should have received so strong and satisfactory a confirmation as they have found at the hands of my opponents in England. They repeat and proclaim, in the Rambler, as “the Catholic Belief” the very same sentiments which my narrative ascribes to the Jesuit at Rome.

Their statement as to their views—containing all they have written applicable to this subject—is as follows :

“ We can, however, linger no more over our author and his work, except so long as to refer briefly to one passage, in which, in a strangely distorted way, he repeats a Catholic doctrine which, we believe, even when it is not misrepresented, is a source of great amazement to the more candid classes of Protestants. He speaks thus of a Catholic priest, who, by the way, by the sleight of hand which is the secret of all Mr. Seymour’s feats, he leads the reader to suppose to have been a Jesuit. ‘ He repeated,’ says Mr. Seymour, ‘ what he had said before on this point, expressive of the greater leniency, the gentler compassion, and the closer sympathies of Mary; adding that he was borne out in such an opinion by that of the Fathers, of whom many were of opinion that even Christ himself was not so willing to hear our prayers, and did not hear them so quickly, when offered simply to Himself, as when they were offered through the Blessed Virgin.’ This abominable calumny our author makes still more spicy by the heading of his chapter, in which we read ‘ Prayer through Mary heard sooner than through Christ.’ ”

“ Now, whatever this good priest did say to Mr. Seymour, we are quite willing to believe that Mr. Seymour did not in the least understand him; and therefore we acquit him of any invention of a pure unmixed falsehood. The doctrine of intercession is practically as strange to our author as invocation of saints itself. Therefore, when he contrasts antithetically prayer through Mary with prayer through Christ, he doubtless believes that these two phrases, if ever thus used by Catholics, are really used in the same sense. If he were in the daily habit of asking and rejoicing in the prayers of living fellow-Christians, and of the saints in glory, as Catholics are, he would have known that the Catholic Church accounts it a damnable heresy to pray ‘through Mary,’ or any other saint, in the same sense as we pray ‘through Christ.’ And there does not exist a Catholic priest in the world who would not say the same to Mr. Seymour, if he were to put the question to him.

“ What, then, was the doctrine which this nameless priest doubtless did express, and what is the Catholic belief on this subject? We have very little more space to spare for Mr. Seymour; but a few words will shew, that if we once admit the true divinity of our blessed Lord, and the efficacy of intercession, with invocation, at all, this doctrine, which so startles the candid Protestant, is undeniably true. For if, in the first place, the intercessory prayer of a Christian, whether he be on earth or in glory, be of any real power in drawing down the grace of God upon us, surely we are more likely to be heard, and attain greater blessings, when this intercession is added to our own prayers, than when we simply pray for ourselves. If words have any meaning, and intercessory prayer is not altogether a delusion and a pious fraud, this must be the case. And what is true of the virtue of intercession in the case of ordinary saints, is of course especially true in the case of the Mother of Jesus Christ himself.

“ Again, in one sense the blessed Virgin Mary is more sure to hear our prayers than our blessed Lord. To suppose that her tenderness, her love, her compassion, are equal to his, or that they can even be compared with his, is most awful blasphemy. She is but a creature, though the first of creatures; while He is the Almighty God, eternal and infinite. His love and compassion for sinners are therefore as boundless as all his other attributes. No created thought can comprehend them in their immeasurable glory and extent; even to Mary herself they are, in their unfathomable greatness, utterly incomprehensible, and the object of her eternal adoration and love. But, at the same time, let it not be forgotten that Jesus is God, in all things, as well as in love for the sinner. In becoming the sinner's Saviour, He does not cease to be his God, or absolutely merge his infinite justice and holiness in that unmixed benevolence which is the one idea that infidels entertain of the Creator of the universe. Though He does not shew to men and angels the full terrors of his justice and holiness, as judge of all, until the last dreadful day, still not for an instant does He cease to exercise judgment upon the children of both Church and world.

" To the saints in heaven, and to his own beloved Mother, He has not, however, committed the charge of rendering justice to those who are still upon earth, in the same way in which He exercises it Himself; just as He has not given it to us to exercise over one another while we yet live here below. ' Revenge is for me; I will repay: saith the Lord.' It is the privilege of Mary to share the loving-kindness of her Son towards sinners, and not to execute his wrath upon them. And therefore she is all mercy, while He is both mercy and justice. Her mercy, indeed, is but the mercy of a creature, while his is that of the omnipotent God; her love is that of an intercessor, his is the love of a Redeemer; but nevertheless, the only office she is commissioned to fulfil towards us is one of pity. And thus, in one sense, a sinner's prayers are more sure of being heard by her than by her Son. She is not called to judge him; she simply knows that he is in misery, and that he asks her to pray for him; and this is enough. Her whole soul overflows with love. ' My son,' she says, ' I am not thy judge, as I am not thy Saviour. Whosoever thou art, and whatsoever thy guilt, it is for me to pray for thee to Him who owns me for his mother.'

" And, in truth, how does this differ from our conduct one to another here upon earth? What have we to do to judge the sinner who calls upon us to intercede for him with our God? It is not for us to institute an inquiry into his past life, and because of the enormity of his conduct refuse him our prayers. What if Mr. Seymour himself were one day to come to some Catholic, repenting of his enmity against the Church, and say, ' My eyes are opened: I see what awful sin I have been guilty of. I have spoken falsehoods against my brother; I have mocked at the Church of Christ ; I have maligned his ministers ; I have insulted his Mother ; I have derided his own adorable presence ; pray for me, for my guilt is great, and though I cry to God for mercy, I may perhaps be still deceiving myself, or have sinned beyond hope of forgiveness.' Should such be his entreaty—and we know that to God nothing is impossible—would it be for one of us to reply, ' No, it cannot be ; you have clearly sinned against the Holy Ghost ; you have shut your eyes wilfully against the light ; the hour of mercy is past, and the moment of judgment come : I cannot forget your blasphemies, your irreverences, your dishonest dealings with both God and man ; and I will not pray for you.' Who does not see that such a rejection of the poor penitent's prayer would be shocking in any living Catholic ? Such as our pity and compassion are, we must be all pity and compassion to him. God alone must be his judge, though that God is also the only Saviour of sinners."

I am altogether unable to divine the object of the writer in all this, admitting, as he does, all that I desired to convey ; nor can I well understand how my opponents in England, after communicating with my opponents in Rome, were unable to offer anything more consistent in the way of reply. How stands the case between us ?

The Jesuit at Rome said—“ It was the opinion of many of the Fathers that God hears our prayers more quickly, when they are offered through the Blessed Virgin, than when offered through any one else.”

This Jesuit, afterwards endeavouring to justify his own opinion by the authority of the Fathers, again said—“ He was borne out in such an opinion by that of the Fathers, of whom many were of opinion that even Christ himself was not so willing to hear our prayers, and did not hear them so quickly when offered simply to himself, as when they were offered through the blessed Virgin.”

Thus my opponent, in order to strengthen his own views by the authority of the Fathers, attributed to them this extraordinary statement. I at once denounced it as "a hideous sentiment ;" and my reviewers add, as above, that it is an "abominable calumny :" a judgment to which I do most fully assent, feeling that this Jesuit did most untruly and unwarrantably calumniate the Fathers, when he attributed to them so unhallowed a sentiment.

But that which perplexed me in this article of the reviewers, even more than this, is, that when this sentiment is ascribed to the Fathers, it is denounced as an "abominable calumny :" but when, in the very same page, this identical sentiment is more fully developed, it is not only not rejected, or denied, or refuted, but actually is adopted and enunciated by the reviewers, and proclaimed as "the Catholic belief." They say—

"What then was the doctrine which this nameless priest doubtless did express, and WHAT IS THE CATHOLIC BELIEF on this subject?..... Surely we are more likely to be heard, and attain greater blessings, when this intercession is added to our own prayers than when we simply pray for ourselves. If words have any meaning, and intercessory prayer is not altogether a delusion and a pious fraud, this must be the case. And what is true of the virtue of intercession in the case of ordinary saints, is of course especially true in the case of the Mother of Jesus Christ himself."

Again the reviewers add—

"In one sense the Blessed Virgin Mary is more sure to hear our prayers than our Blessed Lord..... It is the privilege of Mary to share the loving-kindness of her Son towards sinners, and not to execute his wrath upon them. And therefore she is all mercy, while He is both mercy and justice. Her mercy indeed is but the mercy of a creature, while His is that of the Omnipotent God : her love is that of an intercessor, His the love of a Redeemer: but nevertheless the only office she is commissioned to fulfil towards us is one of pity, and thus, in one sense, a sinner's prayers are more sure to be heard by her than by her Son."

It will at once be perceived that all this is no reply to any statement of mine; but that, on the other hand, it is the very same sentiment with that expressed by my opponents at Rome. The words may be different, but the sense is the same. The process of reasoning may be varied, but the result arrived at is identical, namely, that if the sinner prays through the Virgin Mary, he is more likely to be heard by God, than if he simply prays through Jesus Christ. The only real difference I can discern is, that my opponent at Rome attributed this opinion to the Fathers, while my opponents in England announce it as "the Catholic belief." I did not anticipate so explicit an avowal of the doctrine in this country.

There are some doctrines so utterly unscriptural, and so revolting to a Christian spirit, that they need only be stated. It were a waste of words to answer them; it were like breaking a fly upon the wheel to confute them. I shall therefore, as some allusions to passages in Alphonso de Liguori were made in this conversation, simply adduce those passages, and leave them without comment. I refer to his work entitled, "The Glories of Mary."

"We read in the Chronicles of St. Francis, that Brother Leo once saw in a vision two ladders; one red, at the summit of which was Jesus Christ; and the other white, at the top of which presided his blessed mother. He observed that many who endeavoured to ascend the first ladder, after mounting a few steps, fell down, and on trying again were equally unsuccessful, so that they never attained the summit; but a voice having told them to make trial of the white ladder, they soon gained the top, the blessed Virgin having held forth her hands to help them.” Ch. 8, sec. 3.

Again—

“ St. Bernardine of Sienna does not fear to say that all things, even God himself, are subject to Mary’s empire. The saint means to intimate thereby that God hears Mary’s prayers, as if they were commands. The Lord, says St. Anselm, has so exalted thee, Mary, that his favour has rendered thee omnipotent. Yes, adds St. Lawrence, Mary is omnipotent, for, according to all laws, the Queen enjoys the same privileges as the King; and that power may be equal between the Son and the Mother, Jesus has rendered Mary omnipotent,—the one is omnipotent by nature, the other is omnipotent by grace.” Ch. 6, sec. 1.

Again—

“ What do the Fathers—the Doctors of the Church teach us by texts so strong and so precise? Do they intend to prove that all graces come to us through Mary in this sense only, that she has given us the Author of grace, as our adversary would fain persuade us? Far from it: they, on the contrary, give clearly to understand, that every grace given to man, in virtue of the merits of Jesus Christ, is conveyed to him by the hands of Mary. This is the conclusion of the venerable Suarez of the Society of Jesus. He writes that it is now the general sentiment of the Church, that the intercession of the Mother of God is not only useful, but even necessary to salvation, for the Lord, says St. Bernard, wishes to grant us nothing, without the agency of Mary.... St. Peter Damien goes still farther, asking himself the question, Why has God, before he became incarnate in Mary’s womb, applied for her consent? For two reasons, he replies; first, to oblige us to be very grateful to her; and, secondly, to teach us that our salvation depends on the will of this Blessed Virgin.” Ch. 5, sec. 1.

I leave these extracts without comment. Their author was one of the three saints last canonized; and of his works it is stated in the Act of Canonization, that there is in them nothing contrary to the Catholic faith. Such are the doctrines held and sanctioned at Rome, and from these extracts it may be seen that the Jesuit Priests, with whom I held my conversations, did not express themselves out of the ordinary course ; while at the same time, the language of these reviewers shews that such doctrines are not without their votaries even in England—that they are regarded as consistent with “ THE CATHOLIC BELIEF.”

CHAPTER VI.

OBJECTIONS TO THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND—ALLEGED DANGER TO SALVATION IN REMAINING IN A CHURCH SO NEW IN HER ORIGINAL—HER CONTRAST IN THAT RESPECT WITH THE CHURCH OF ROME—WHETHER SHE ORIGINATED WITH THE MONK AUGUSTINE FROM ROME—OR WAS FOUNDED AT THE REFORMATION—WHETHER HER REFORMS WERE ARBITRARY OR ON FIXED RULE—WHETHER HER DOCTRINES BE ANCIENT OR MODERN—WHETHER HER DOCTRINES BE ADMITTED BY THE CHURCH OF ROME—COMPARATIVE SAFETY OF THE MEMBERS OF THE TWO CHURCHES—WHETHER THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND BE A BRANCH OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH—WHETHER HER REFORMS BE JUSTIFIED—WHETHER SHE OR THE CHURCH OF ROME WERE GUILTY OF SCHISM AT THE REFORMATION.

THERE were some conversations with my interesting friends that greatly perplexed and troubled me. The subject under discussion was at times so deeply interesting and absorbing to myself personally, that I could scarcely expect to succeed in so restraining myself and concealing my feelings as to appear in the light of one who was calmly stating his objections to communion with the Church of Rome, and seeking for information. So long as our conversations had reference only to my objections to the Church of Rome, and so long as they merely exhibited or developed the peculiar system of religious ideas prevalent at Rome, I was able, without much difficulty, to appear as a quiet listener and calm enquirer. But when they left the exhibition and defence of their own Church, and made their attack upon the Church of England, I felt conscious of being placed in a position totally different. I was then placed on the defensive ; and though I felt very confident that I should be able to vindicate the Church of England, yet I was conscious of a nervous eagerness and a personal earnestness that might at times lead me into the display of the spirit of controversy. Those Christian persons, who have had any experience of the bitter waters of controversy, will understand my difficulties. They were many and great, and conscious as I am of my many failings under them, I have only to bow my head and confess that I have been dealt with more mercifully and lovingly than I deserved or expected.

It was peculiarly thus when one of my reverend friends, who had already been with me and discussed several subjects, called on me. We conversed for some time on the celibacy of the clergy as enjoined in the Church of Rome. Our arguments were too long to insert here ; and the subject was changed by my friend's suddenly pausing and seeming desirous of entering on some other topic then occupying his mind. He turned round, and, as if he had not heard what I had last said, asked me in the most confiding and winning way, to tell him candidly and confidentially whether since our last interview I had not found myself inclining more to the Catholic Church—whether I had made any way in that direction—whether from all I had now seen and heard, I had not felt more inclined to the Catholic Church.

This question was so proposed that I could not escape it unless by bringing him back to my own question as to celibacy and marriage, which we had been discussing ; and this might seem too like the spirit of a controversialist ; so I thought it best to let it pass for the present, to be revived on some other opportunity, and proceeded to reply to his enquiry.

I said, with as much deliberation as I could command, that I would not practise any deception with him on such a subject—that for many years my religious opinions had been formed, and my theological judgment settled—that those opinions and judgment had been altogether against the Church of Rome—and that, as they were strongly felt, so were they strongly expressed by me on all public occasions. But, I added, that I never had seen the system as fully developed in its working in a land altogether under the influence and power of the Church of Rome, and that I always desired to see and examine its effects, its nature, its fruits, its developments in the seat and fountain of all—the city of Rome ;—that the object of my then visit to that city, was to inform myself in this matter, not by books and reports of others, but on my own personal observation —that if I knew myself, I was prepared to abandon any and every opinion I had previously formed, the moment sufficient evidence called on me to do so—that the results hitherto were that some opinions were changed, some prejudices removed, and some judgments modified ; but that, on the whole, owing to what I had myself seen and heard on the spot, my former convictions were not only confirmed, but were carried yet further against the Church of Rome ; —that whether arising from my English notions, or my Protestant prejudices, which he must kindly forgive, the scenes which I had myself witnessed with my own eyes, left on my own mind an impression more unfavorable than ever against his Church.

He gently and courteously expressed his regret at this, but added, that he was not surprised at it—for that he was prepared ; and that I too ought to be prepared to find many and great prejudices to contend with : but, he said, it was only right that I should inform him fully as to what those things were which formed my difficulties, and which seemed to have so influential an effect on my mind—that he perhaps might be able to remove them or modify them ; for, he continued, it may be that they do not belong to the essence of the Catholic Church, being only accessories—matters on which conformity may not be necessary—mere accessories that ought not to have this influence on my mind.

To this appeal I was on the point of answering, when he stopped me by going on to say, that he looked on many points as not merely accessories, but as inferior in importance, as undeserving of and disentitled to much consideration, the great and chief question to be considered being, whether the Catholic Church or Protestant Church—the Catholic Church of Rome, or the Protestant Church of England, was the true Church of Christ, out of which there could be no salvation. This, he said, was the grand point for me to examine, as all the others were involved in it. And it was for me to determine whether I could continue in my present position with safety to my soul. You are to consider, he continued, with much animation, that the Church of Rome has all antiquity on her side, having been a Church from the beginning, and that it has been from her that you have received your religion—your mission—your orders, through St. Augustine, who was sent from Rome, and first planted the Church of Christ among you. You are to consider that she has all holiness on her side, for all the Fathers and all the Saints are with her ; and, as for learning, she has had the most profound men of all kinds of learning—that she has all unity in herself, all her parts and members thinking the same thing, adopting the same rule, and all united and governed by Him, who is the centre of all unity—the successor of St. Peter—that she is the Universal Church, extending over all the nations of the world, having millions of children in every nation and every country on the face of the earth—that she alone has received the promise of our Lord that he would be with his Church through all ages, even to the end of the world ; for it was true, of only her, that she alone had overcome all opposition, and had survived all ages. You are to consider, he said, with increased vivacity, all this on one hand, and you are then to consider on the other, that the Church of England—a Church only created a few centuries ago—a Church that is but the offspring of the worst passions of man—a Church that has ever been the mere servant and slave of power—a Church that has been ever varying and ever divided, so as to look like anything rather than the Church at unity with itself—you are to consider whether this Church of England be indeed the Church of Christ—the Church founded by Christ himself—the Church founded eighteen centuries ago—and you are to consider and determine this before you enter on the examination of any other question, because all depends upon the solution of this.

And if this enquiry be made, he added with warmth, he could no longer doubt the results, for it would be but deciding between a Church eighteen centuries old and a Church only three centuries old—between a Church in a state of the most perfect unity, and a Church divided and distracted—between a Church connected with the Head and Centre of unity, and a Church as a branch broken off and withered from the apostolic tree—between a Church, all whose doctrines were ancient, and of universal reception, and a Church whose whole system is a novelty, and which is received only by a few. And the comparison being thus made, there could be anticipated but one result ; but this result must be first determined, before so much as entering on the examination of any other question.

My friend continued in this strain for some time, expressing himself with great eloquence. There was not for many minutes the least cessation on his part, nor interruption on mine. And though I have to regret the impossibility of my detailing every word that fell from him, yet its substance was the foregoing, as committed to paper by me at the time. I remained throughout an attentive listener to arguments which I had heard a thousand times before repeated, and held myself prepared to answer, the moment he might conclude. When he had ceased, which he did with an air of conscious triumph, and looked for the effect of his argument, I at once commenced my reply, avoiding by my tone and manner, the appearance of a controversialist.

I stated, that in England we were in the habit of looking on the origin or antiquity of the English Church in a light very different from that in which it appeared in his eyes—that we always held that there had been a Church in Britain in the time of the Romans, long previous to the arrival of Augustine and —

“No, no,” he exclaimed in a rather triumphant tone, “there never was a Church there until St. Augustine came from Rome, and preached religion and founded the Church there.”

I said very gently that I could not but fear he was under a slight mistake; for that Augustine came to England at the close of the sixth century, about A.D. 595: that he found Bertha the queen of Kent already a Christian, with a Christian Church and a Christian chaplain: that though heathenism prevailed among the Saxon population, yet he found among the Ancient Britons, in the west of England, a Church with many presbyters and bishops, and that Christianity had been preached and received there some centuries before the time of Augustine, almost from the days of the Apostles, and certainly in the time of the Romans.

“O yes,” he said, interrupting me, “perhaps there was a Church in the time of the Romans, but then it came from Lucius—it came from the Catholic Church of Rome.”

I replied that my present argument did not concern itself with the quarter from whence it came—that I would deal with that afterwards—that in England, where the best evidences were to be found as touching the history of her Church, it was universally felt, because clearly proved, that there was a Church in Britain at a very early age—founded perhaps by the Apostle Paul, as some of the primitive Fathers state; that that Church in the times of the Romans was fearfully persecuted, especially in the times of the Diocletian persecution, its temples destroyed, and its members martyred ; that having afterwards widely spread itself again, it was again wasted and destroyed by the Saxon invasion, its bishops and presbyters and multitudes of votaries escaping to the West ; so that when Augustine arrived he found the Saxon population in the worst heathenism, while he also found in the West a large population of Christians. He proposed to them to submit to the supremacy of the Bishop of Rome. They refused, on the grounds that they had Bishops of their own, and said they owed love, but not obedience, to the Bishop of Rome. Augustine thus found a British Church already established before his arrival, an ancient and independent Church. But after some years, he and his successors succeeded, by the weakness of the rulers of England, and by the power of the Bishops of Rome, in reducing the independence of that Church, and inducing that whole Church to submit to the authority and supremacy of the see of Rome.

My friend, who was very eager and impatient to interrupt me at every moment, seemed now quite pleased and satisfied at my acknowledgment that the Church of England had submitted to the Church of Rome.

I repeated my statement, that the ancient Church of Britain, in process of some centuries, had been induced to forego her independence, and to submit to the see of Rome ; and then, I added, as a consequence to this, during her connection with Rome, certain doctrines and practices peculiar to that see were gradually introduced. In process of time those peculiar doctrines and practices appeared to the clergy and people of England to have been wrongly introduced, as novelties and errors, that were inconsistent with the simplicity and purity of their ancient Church. They began to look on them as corruptions, or at least tending to corruption, and needing a Reformation. There was the public service of the Church performed in Latin, which was not understood by the people, and which was contrary to their ancient practice. There was the constant invocation of, and praying to the Virgin Mary, and saints, and angels, introduced into the public liturgy, a practice inconsistent with their old religion. There was the turning the communion of the Lord's Supper into a propitiatory sacrifice, and celebrated in private, contrary to all her primitive custom. There was the withholding the cup from the lay-people in the administration of the communion, making it only a half-communion, in plain opposition to the original institution. There was celibacy enforced upon the clergy, which was regarded as very injurious to the morality and well-being of society, and contrary to the ancient liberty of the English Church. There were indulgences, dispensations, faculties, and numerous other devices by which the wealth was abstracted from the country, for the aggrandisement of the court of Rome. There was the exemption of ecclesiastical persons from the civil tribunals of the king and country. There were doctrines and practices about images and reliques, and purgatory, and various other matters, all which seemed to the people of England to be evils, more or less inconsistent with the doctrines, practice, and independence of the Church of England, and introduced by the Church of Rome, during the times when the Church of England recognised the authority of the Church of Rome.

All these seemed to the clergy and people of England, to require abatement or reformation, and they therefore reformed their Church, as they had an undoubted right. They interfered with no other Church, but they reformed their own :—bishops, priests, and people, by the authority vested in them, and with the full approval of the sovereign and civil rulers, reformed the Church, not by annihilating an old Church, and founding a new one, but by removing the abuses and corruptions that times and circumstances had introduced. As our blessed Lord did not destroy the temple of Jerusalem, did not remove one pillar nor deface one ornament, when he cleansed it of such corruptions as money-changing and merchandise, and thus reforming and not destroying it,—purifying and not marring it, so the people of England, removing the evils and corruptions that had been introduced, restored their Church in her ancient and primitive purity. When therefore, I continued, we speak of the Church of England, we speak of a Church some eighteen centuries old, and not, as you suppose, a Church of only three centuries' existence—a Church as ancient, or very nearly as ancient as your own—a Church that was not cradled in passion, as you suppose, but rocked and nurtured by the loving spirit of Christian missions—a Church that was marred and clouded for a time during her submission to Rome, but now purified and reformed, is no novel Church, as your argument and contrasts suppose, but is the same old Church of England still.

My friend seemed as if he was taken a little unawares by this mode of meeting his statements, but he soon collected himself, and replied, by saying, that my whole position was founded on the assertion, that there had been a British Church before the arrival of Augustine. He stated that there certainly was no Christianity among the Saxons before the mission of that saint, and that it was he who was the blessed instrument of introducing the true religion as commissioned by the successor of St. Peter,—that, admitting the previous existence of a Church among the Britons in the times of the Romans, yet that Church was founded by missionaries from Rome ;—that whether in the time of Lucius, or of Gregory, true religion was first imported into England by missions from Rome—that at all events it was Pope Gregory who sent Augustine to propagate the Catholic faith in the island, and that it was without any question identically the faith of the Church of Rome, that that saint and missionary then preached, and established with a wonderful and miraculous success :—and that thus there was no doubt, that the Catholic Church—the Church of Rome was the holy mother of the Church of England. Having stated this clearly, he went on to argue, that the daughter was bound to obedience and submission to her mother,—that having received the Catholic faith from her, she should receive and retain the whole of that faith without exception,—that having learned the true discipline from her, she ought to observe the same, without any curtailments—that having been converted, christened, established through the Church of Rome, she was bound in everything to receive the doctrines and discipline of that Church, and to render to her the full and perfect submission and obedience of a daughter ; and that anything short of this was schism and rebellion.

I stated concisely in reply to this, that his principle—namely, that the daughter-church must always remain in submissive obedience to the mother-church—was a principle to which I could not assent,—that I was sure he would not assent to it himself, when he recollects that the Church of Rome was founded by missionaries from the Church of Jerusalem—that Rome was the daughter, and Jerusalem the mother ; and that therefore, on his principle, the Bishop of Rome owed submission and obedience to the Bishop of Jerusalem ! He was evidently displeased at this mode of reply, so I passed on to say, that the Church of America was first founded by missions from the Church of England, and that we should think it a most monstrous assumption if the archbishop of Canterbury demanded the submission and obedience of the American Bishops and people. No, I continued, it has been a valuable principle of the universal Church in all ages, that Bishops are equal and independent in their own dioceses, and therefore, when there was a Bishop at Rome, he was independent of the Bishop of Jerusalem, and when there was a Bishop in England, he was independent of the Bishop of Rome, and when there was a Bishop in America, he was independent of the Bishops of England. I added, that beside all this, there was the further consideration, that the people of England felt and loved the freedom and independence of their Church, and as they sought not to interfere in the affairs of other Churches, so they would not permit any other Church to assume authority over the Church of England. They felt she was their own, and were resolved that none else should interfere with them.

He undertook to reply to this elaborately, stating that it was founded on the assumption that there had been a Christian Church in Britain before the arrival of Saint Augustine. His statement however, was so confused, and his mistakes of history so many, as might be expected and excused in a foreigner, that I am partly unable and partly unwilling to make an accurate narration of them. He left the question, however, after a time, as one of history, and proceeded to argue that the Reformation was wholly unnecessary—that perhaps there were a few things, mere accessories, matters of trivial importance, mere points of discipline, which might most easily have been settled, whereas the Reformation itself was a change which arose out of the worst passions of men. It was the creation of one of the greatest of despots, and as it was begun in passion, so it was accomplished in despotism. There might indeed, he added, have been, perhaps there were, some adventitious things, some accessories, some non-essentials of religion, which needed reformation, but they could most easily have been changed, and were changed in the Council of Trent. That Council remedied and reformed all that required a remedy or reform.

I replied by saying that the cry for a reformation did not begin with Luther or with the sixteenth century—for it had pervaded the whole of Europe for more than a century previous. I reminded him that the cry was universal in the beginning of the preceding century, that the Council of Constance, one of the most remarkable and illustrious Councils ever held in the history of the Church, was assembled to effect “A Reformation in the Church, both in its head and in its members ;”—that that Council assembled in 1414, more than a century before the time of Luther, and both by the letter of the Pope, and by the statement of the Emperor, and by all the announcements of the Council itself, it was formally and publicly set forth that it was assembled to effect “a Reformation of the Church, both in its head and in its members.” And that afterwards the Council of Basle was assembled in 1435 with the avowed purpose of accomplishing “a Reformation of the Church, both in its head and in its members.” Two of the most celebrated Councils in the history of the Church were thus convened on the open, avowed principle that a reformation was necessary—that one unanimous cry pervaded universal Christendom, that a reformation was necessary—and this prevailing conviction it was that enabled Luther and others to accomplish that reformation. So far from being over-hasty, he commenced only in 1517, more than a century after the Council of Constance, in the name of the universal Church, had declared its absolute necessity ! Truly, I added, we must think that they were matters of more importance than mere accessories —mere non-essentials as he intimated, that elicited and sustained this universal sense of all Christendom as to the need of a reformation. And as for the Council of Trent, I continued, if did not assemble till 1545, nearly thirty years after Luther had first taken his successful stand for a Reformation. If that Council had been willing, which it was not, to accomplish a real Reformation, it was too late ;—the work was already accomplished by other and truer hands !

My friend did not like this, but repeated his statement that there was nothing needing reformation beyond a few accessories and non-essentials, which could easily be remedied, and were actually amended by the Couucil of Trent. He added, with great animation, that in England the reformation was carried on in the most arbitrary manner—that there was neither reason given nor reason received for its wild and unheard-of novelties—that a love of novelty and change and revolution was its ruling spirit—that having received the true faith, the Catholic religion from Rome, the Church of England had no right to resist or lay aside any part or portion of what she has received; she was bound obediently to receive and faithfully to retain the whole body of doctrine and discipline thus committed to her keeping—that she had no right to retain one portion and refuse the rest, arbitrarily choosing one thing and arbitrarily rejecting another—that there was no right whatever in the Church of England thus disobediently and rebelliously selecting and refusing arbitrarily what had been committed to her—that she had no right whatever to proceed in this arbitrary way—that she had no right whatever to make any distinction—that she had once received the Catholic faith from Rome, and should have kept the whole, or rejected the whole.

It will easily be believed by all who have had experience of controversy, that I found considerable difficulty in the management of this conversation. It was purely a conversation that seemed rapidly assuming the form of a polemical discussion. It was insensibly ceasing to be merely conversational, and was becoming controversial; and there was danger of my betraying, like my friend, the spirit of controversy and the desire for mastery in the struggle. I felt myself in danger of showing myself too much personally interested in the success of my views. I therefore resolved to express myself as if detailing what might be the objections, or what were the arguments generally used in England, and regarded by the members of the Church as weighty and adequate on the point before us; as if giving expression to what might be the opinions of others, rather than exhibiting myself as personally involved.

I replied therefore by saying that it would, as I apprehended, be very difficult to impress the mind of England with the principle which he had thus laid down—that whereas his argument seemed to be, that as the Church of England received the Gospel from the Church of Rome, she was bound to accept the whole or reject the whole that was held in that Church, making no distinction whatever between one thing and another; the answer which would probably be urged in England, and urged too with great effect, would be, that she was bound to accept whatever seemed sound and true, and to reject whatever seemed unsound and erroneous—to retain what was right and to refuse what was wrong; and it could under no circumstances whatever be justifiable to accept and believe and embrace what was false, merely because it came in company with what was true. I added that there was a vast fund of common sense among the people of England, and that all the little rules of schoolmen melted away before the universal exercise of that common sense. And yet further, that he would be looked on as having totally misunderstood the spirit and nature of the Reformation, when he supposed it went on the system of arbitrarily rejecting one thing and arbitrarily retaining another. The Reformation of the Church of England was accomplished on a settled principle. That which was according to Holy Scripture was retained. That which was contrary to the same was rejected. The Holy Scriptures of God were prominently put forward and assumed as the test. For example, Episcopacy was retained because it was consistent with Scripture, while Invocation of Saints was rejected because it was inconsistent with Scripture. A Liturgy was retained, but a Liturgy in an unknown language was rejected. Two Sacraments were retained, but the other five so-called Sacraments were rejected: whatever was deemed according to Scripture was retained, while whatever was regarded as contrary to Scripture was rejected. I therefore added, that there was no accusation he could make against the Reformation of the Church of England more likely to give offence to the people of England, than the statement that her Reformation was an arbitrary rejection of one thing and an arbitrary reception of another. The universal feeling of the men of all parties and all sects in England was to make the Holy Scriptures—the Word of God—the test to try and determine every question of religion.

His reply to this was in a total change of manner. He had been warm. His earnest zeal had exhibited itself, and though he had forgotten himself and his position for the moment, yet I could not but like him in my heart all the better for his earnestness. Now, however, he seemed to impose a constraint on himself, and spoke in a manner and in a tone totally different. He said, as if thoughtfully,—as if waking from a reverie, in which he had not heard a word I had said, that he felt there was no real peace of mind out of the true Church—the Church of Rome—and that I never could enjoy the grace of the soul in the Church of England—that he had now, in so many interviews, seen enough of me to be able to say that I never could have peace out of the Church of Rome—that one possessed of my knowledge of Theology—with my acquaintance with ecclesiastical history—with my love of truth and spirit of arguing, it was impossible to have peace if I remained in the Church of England. He then paid some very smooth and courteous compliments to both my head and my heart, which I will not here repeat, but which seemed to me at the moment, to be but preparatives for something less pleasing and palatable. I might, he said, go on for a time under a false peace of mind, but the hour would come—the bed of death must come, sooner or later—and though all might now seem to go on well for a time, yet there and then there could be no peace—no peace whatever. I appeal to you, said he, with increasing earnestness, whether you could possibly die in peace in the bosom of such a Church as the Church of England—a Church of only yesterday—a Church of the passions of man—a Church without any one of the marks by which the true Catholic Church alone can be recognised—a Church that consists of nothing but novelties—a Church that is necessarily limited to a very minute portion of the world—a Church that is torn in pieces and crumbling into ruins by her own divisions. It is utterly impossible that an enquiring mind, one possessed with intellect and knowledge and love of truth, could continue in such a Church, and find peace within her bosom in the hour of death. It is impossible. And, he added, you ought to remember it is far better to make any and every sacrifice of friends, family, interest and all, now, rather than be without peace on the bed of death. Have you, he asked earnestly, have you prayed to be converted?

As this was a personal appeal, I could not escape it, nor indeed did I desire it, and after a few moments secret reflection, I replied with all earnestness, that I valued, above all else, the peace of the soul—that I knew there was a false peace where the soul was soothed, and lulled into a mistaken security—that I read and felt the words of Scripture, warning us against those who cried, “ peace, peace, when there was no peace ;”—that to obtain the true peace of God, “ that peace which passeth all understanding, and which keepeth the heart and mind in the love of God, and of Christ Jesus our Lord,”—it is necessary that we be prepared to sacrifice all : “ What shall a man profit who should gain the whole word and lose his own soul, and what shall a man give in exchange for his soul ? ” I added, that if I knew myself, it was my constant desire and earnest prayer, to be led into all truth, a prayer for light, knowledge, guidance, but as for praying for my conversion to the Church of Rome I never did, and I never could—that I prayed to be converted from all that is erroneous, and conducted to all that is holy and true, but that I must not—could not pray for conversion from the Church of England, which I felt to be both holy and true, to that Church of Rome which I believed to be neither holy nor true.

He assented quietly to the propriety of this sentiment, but went on to ask, how it was possible that I could hope for peace in so novel a Church as the Church of England. Whatever I might have said of her antiquity as a Church, still the whole system of her doctrines was novel.

I do not know that he could have led me to a point on which I felt myself stronger, or on which I wished to ascertain, whether the Jesuits of Rome had anything to offer, beside the trite and often repeated statements made on this subject. I therefore immediately responded to his appeal ; I reminded him that we had already considered the point of the antiquity, or novelty of the Church of England as a Christian Church—that I had shewn, that so far from being a Church of only three centuries existence, she was really a Church of the very earliest and most ancient date. And now, I added, his assertion was, that her doctrines were novel, presuming that he meant that her doctrines since the Reformation were novel.

He assented readily to this, saying, that his present argument was, that although ancient perhaps as a Church, she was novel as to her doctrines,—that her doctrines, as held since the Reformation were novel.

I then stated, that there was an argument on this point, well known, and universally felt in England, and I begged he would forgive me for expressing my feeling, that I had never heard an adequate answer to it—that the Church of England had a right to ask—what and where are the novel doctrines she teaches? The argument usual in England, as clearly as I could state it, was this—that there were four creeds—that three of these, namely, the Apostles', the Nicene, and the Athanasian, were ancient creeds of the primitive Church, and that the fourth, namely, the creed of Pope Pius, was a modern creed, received only by the Roman Church,—that the Church of England received the Apostles' Creed, it was ancient, and according to Scripture; also the Nicene Creed, which was ancient, and according to Scripture; also the Athanasian Creed, being ancient, and according to Scripture;—that her creeds are thus ancient, and her articles of faith thus primitive, and that therefore her system of doctrine could not reasonably be called novel. Her creeds, i. e. her articles of faith, are the very same as the creeds of the primitive Churches. Every creed that they received, she also receives, without addition or diminution, and therefore she ought not, and cannot, justly be accused of holding or teaching novelties. This, I added, was the argument or answer usually made in England to every charge, as to novelty of doctrine, and it must be allowed, as it seemed to me, to be one very difficult, if not impossible to overthrow, at least, I could see no way of replying satisfactorily to it, unless he could enable me to specify where and what was the novel doctrine.

I paused for a moment, to enable him to give me an answer before my turning the argument against his own Church. He was silent. I therefore continued, saying, that in England it was usual to advance the charge of novelty against the Church of Rome, and the argument was this—that, of the four creeds, three were primitive, and one was modern—that the Church of England received the three that were primitive, and rejected only that one which was modern,—that that modern one, compiled by Pope Pius, was composed for the first time in the sixteenth century, AFTER THE REFORMATION and AFTER THE COUNCIL OF TRENT!—and that that creed, thus novel, and utterly unknown and unthought of in the primitive Church, was now the received and recognised creed, more prized, and invested with more authority, than any other creed in the Church of Rome. I added, that this argument was frequently urged in England as a proof, that while the creeds of the Church of England are primitive, that of the Church of Rome is novel; and that I could not but say, that I saw not how it could be answered.

He replied in a manner that struck me as disturbed and perplexed, as if he was a little disappointed and annoyed at having to argue his way with more effort than he had anticipated. He said, that creeds were nothing, and that they were no signs or evidences of the faith of a Church—that they might perhaps be regarded as the signs and evidences of some few articles of belief, but not of the general faith of a Church as a whole system—that this was the character of the three primitive creeds to which I had referred, and that they therefore proved nothing—that though the creed of Pope Pius was originally composed by him in the sixteenth century, and was thus modern, as compared with the others, yet every separate article of faith in that creed was as ancient as the other creeds, having been always and universally held and taught from the beginning of the Church—that it was compiled, in order to embody those ancient truths of the true Catholic faith which had been obscured or denied by the Protestants, and which, just then, had been settled and decreed at the Council of Trent. He then quickly turned from the argument, saying, that the Council of Trent had heard every cause of reasonable complaint, and remedied every abuse that time had introduced into the discipline and practice of the Church, and that that council had decreed no novel doctrine, and made no change in the ancient Catholic Faith—that the true Catholic Church was still the very same from the beginning—that kingdoms and empires had changed, but she had not changed,—that Churches and sects had varied, but she had not varied,—and as we looked around on the diversities of times, countries, manners, we are constrained to acknowledge, that the only thing unchanged, because unchangeable, was the Catholic Church.

I stated, that his reply would not be held in England as satisfactory—that many there would go so far as to say that it was no reply to the real argument. How stands the question? You charge the Church of England with novelty of doctrine. She answers by saying, first, that all her creeds are the admitted creeds of the primitive Church; she has adopted them in her articles, and inserted them in her liturgy; —and therefore that all the articles of her faith are identical with those of the primitive Church, and that thus she cannot justly be accused of novelty. And she answers by saying, secondly, that it is the Church of Rome that has composed a modern creed, a novel series of articles, not one of which was ever embodied in any ancient creed whatever, and that therefore the charge of novelty of doctrine may more justly be advanced against her. I added, that this method of arguing, or rather this view of the subject, might seem very erroneous to him, and might perhaps be very weak in itself, but still it was very popular in England, and required a clearer answer than it had yet received, so far as my reading went,—that he must not be surprised at its popularity, when I should tell him that it was not uncommon there to take a copy of the creed of Pope Pius; one part of it being the articles of the Nicene Creed, the other part being the twelve new articles added by Pope Pius; the former being primitive, the latter being modern, and then, with a pair of scissors to cut the creed into its two parts, retaining the former, because primitive, and rejecting the latter, because modern. An argument like this has great weight upon the plain common sense of the people of England, and the clergy of their Church knew how to use it effectually. And I therefore asked my friend, whether he could give me a popular answer to so popular an argument.

He shewed no disposition to deal directly with the point, but observed, as he had done before, that creeds were nothing—that they were no signs or evidences of the faith of a Church—that the twelve articles added by Pope Pius to the Nicene Creed were truths that had always been held—that they were approved by all that was learned in the world, and received by all that was holy in the Church.

I then again asked, whether, seeing the Church of England receives all the ancient creeds, he could specify any novel doctrine that was held by her. I paused for an answer, but received none, and I therefore then asked, whether, seeing the Church of Rome compiled a new creed so late as the sixteenth century, even AFTER THE REFORMATION, it did not give ground for a presumption that her doctrines were novel.

He gave no answer to either of these enquiries, other than saying, that creeds were nothing, and that the twelve articles added by Pope Pius had been held at all times, and in all places, and by all persons, and that they were spreading in the Church of England herself—that a large section of that Church, and an increasing section, was steadily inclining more and more to these very articles of the Church of Rome—that thus a great division existed within the bosom of the Church of England on this subject—that many were privately embracing that very system which I was then impugning—and, that though I might not be aware of it, he had most certain knowledge of the fact.

I answered, that I did not see how that fact—however true—could meet the argument or explain the difficulty as to the creeds; and then, I added, that I believed the fact as he stated it to be strictly true, but that he ought to remember the analogous movements in the Church of Rome in Germany, where a portion of the priests are calling for a change in several particulars, calling for the public services in the vernacular tongue ; calling for a rescinding of the canons enforcing celibacy ; calling for the giving of the Sacramental cup to the laity—in short, manifesting a division in the Church of Rome, quite as remarkable as that to which he alluded in the Church of England. If there are divisions in one Church, there are also divisions in the other.

He said he had no fears about the movement in Germany, and spoke of it with marked contempt, saying, that before they died, they would all be asking to be received again into the Church. He then asserted, that it was always thus, saying that on the other hand no Catholic was ever known to become a Protestant on his death-bed.

I felt this was only a diversion from our main subject, and therefore, though I met his statement, and we conversed for a short time respecting it, yet I here omit it as interfering with our general argument, to which we soon returned.

The conversation had hitherto been led by my friend. He had been impeaching the Church of England as an unsafe Church for me to peril my soul within her communion. He had objected that it was of only three centuries existence. He seemed afterwards to waive this objection. He had then objected that it was novel in its system of doctrines, and my reply as to the creeds had received no attempt at an answer. I felt he had failed in his own positions, and I felt too he had failed in being unable to specify any instance of novelty of doctrine in the Church of England. I now thought of no longer standing on the mere defensive, but felt I might safely carry the war into his own camp, by urging similar objections to his own Church. But I resolved to do this, as if I was only defending the Church of England.

I said, that in considering the two Churches of England and Rome, it ought always to be kept in view, that all the doctrines, all the Articles of Faith in the Church of England are, without a single exception, received and affirmed in the Church of Rome. There is not one solitary exception; so that Rome cannot charge England with holding a single error of doctrine. For example, the Church of England holds that the Holy Scriptures are the rule of faith—the Church of Rome holds the very same, namely, that the Holy Scriptures are the rule of faith, but she adds that tradition is another and further rule for interpretation. Again, the Church of England holds that the man Christ Jesus is the one Mediator of redemption and intercession between Godhead and Manhood. The Church of Rome holds the very same, namely, that Jesus Christ is such a Mediator; but she also adds that the Virgin Mary and other Saints are also Mediators of Intercession. Again, the Church of England teaches, that there are two Sacraments, namely, Baptism and the Supper of the Lord. The Church of Rome holds the very same, holding both these to be Sacraments of Christ, but adding some five other alleged Sacraments. Again, the Church of England holds that we are justified by faith in Christ, which secures to us the righteousness and merits of Christ. The Church of Rome holds the same, namely, the justifying us by faith in Christ; but she adds the merits of saints and the righteousness of men. I traced this through several other particulars, calling his attention to the fact, that all the Articles of Faith—all that was positive in her Articles—were received in the Church of Rome herself. And therefore there is no room on her part to object or except against any one article of the faith of the Church of England. Rome cannot impeach the soundness of any item of doctrine in England. And therefore if it be stated that it is unsafe to remain in her communion, it must be on some other ground than unsoundness of doctrine.

To all this he listened with marked and courteous attention; but when I paused, expecting a reply, he seemed more disposed to let me proceed.

I therefore said that it was usually argued in the Church of Rome, that, though the Church of England held soundly all she did hold—that though all her positive doctrines were also held in the Church of Rome, and were sound—yet that she had omitted some essentials of the faith, and was thus an unsafe communion—that though she held the truth, yet she held not all the truth that was essential. I added, that this objection had never possessed much weight with the people of England, who always conceived that they held all that was essential—all the great body of Christian verity, and this too on the full admission of the Church of Rome herself; for they were in the habit of arguing in England, that if the doctrines of the Church of England were subtracted from the doctrines of the Church of Rome—that if the faith of England were subtracted from the faith of Rome, the residuum, so far from containing anything essential, would be very worthless indeed. For example: if we take away the Holy Scriptures and leave nothing but tradition—if we take away the two Sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, and leave only the other five alleged Sacraments—if we take away the three primitive creeds and leave only the modern one of Pope Pius—if we take away the Mediatorship of Jesus Christ and leave only that of the Virgin Mary and the Saints—if we take away the merits and righteousness of the Redeemer, and leave only the imagined merits and righteousness of men—if we take away Heaven and Hell, and leave only Purgatory—if we thus subtract the items of doctrine, the Articles of Faith held by the Church of England, from those held by the Church of Rome, we leave her nothing worth having—we leave her nothing but a lifeless and unsubstantial shadow of religion, taking away all that is truly valuable, and leaving her without anything but valueless accessories. The argument therefore is, that as all the positive Articles of the Church of England are received and held as sound in the Church of Rome, and as, if those Articles of England be deducted from the faith of Rome, there will remain only a worthless residuum; so it must be safe to remain in the Church of England, even more safe than in the Church of Rome. I added, that this process of reasoning, a popular one in England, required an answer; and as I was not aware of any, I asked whether he could propose one.

My friend listened to all this with apparent attention and interest, and proceeded to answer, by saying, that he must admit that all the positive articles, all the dogmatic teachings of the Church of England were sound,—that they were identical with those of the Roman Catholic Church, though unhappily they were ill-understood and worse interpreted; but that it ought always to be remembered, that these sound and true articles were all received from the Church of Rome

—that earlier or later, they came from the centre of Unity at Rome—and that thus the Church of England stands indebted to Rome for all that is sound in her faith. And his opinion was, that as the Church of England received so much on the authority of Rome, she was bound to receive the rest, or rather to have retained the rest, especially as she had previously received and held it.

I apologised here for interrupting him, saying, that the foundation on which he seemed about to argue was a mistake—a very common one, I admitted, but still a mistake. He assumed that the Church of England received and held her positive articles of faith on the authority of the Church of Rome. She receives and holds them only on the authority of God—on the authority of His word—on the authority of His Holy Scriptures. All we find there we receive and hold;—all that we find not there, we pronounce unnecessary to salvation. In this matter we never think of the authority, not even of the existence of the Church of Rome.

He replied, by saying, that however the matter might be explained, there was no doubt as to the fact that England received the faith from Rome, that the Church of England is the daughter-church of Rome, and that a large portion of her doctrines came originally from Rome. He was ready to admit, that thus the Church of England retained much valuable truth, much of the principal doctrines of the faith, perhaps all the principal ones, but still it did not follow that she was safe, or that any man could continue safely in her communion;—and on this ground, namely, that while she retained much that was essential, she had cast away much that was also essential. As for those which she retained, they cannot serve or save her, because some of them she has altered and perverted, and others she has misunderstood and clouded, and all of them she has received in a different and uncatholic sense. As for those which she rejected, she divorced herself from the alone centre of Unity, the chair of St. Peter. She cast from her truths which were held from the beginning ;—she separated herself from Catholic unity ;—she broke the chain of apostolic succession ;—she broke herself off from the apostolical tree, so that she now stands by herself, a minute Church, differing as well as separate from all the rest of Christendom, divided within herself, giving occasion to endless divisions ; giving birth to every variety of dissenting sects, and without any connecting link or bond with Christ's Catholic Church. Her doctrines are uncertain, her discipline is loose, her origin is novel, her condition is rent asunder by divisions,—all within her seems going to ruin. It is not possible,—he added with great animation,—it is not possible to remain with safety in such a Church, and if her members would be safe, it is necessary to come back to that Church from which she originally received all that was sound and valuable in her ?

To this I replied, that there was an obvious answer that might be made to this, namely, that it was more safe to remain in the Church of England than in the Church of Rome. And on this ground,—that all the positive doctrines of the Church of England are already received, acknowledged, admitted by the Church of Rome, as sound, and Scriptural, and Catholic, so that for their truth and certainty, there is the evidence of the Church of Rome herself, and the assent of the whole Church Catholie. All these doctrines thus are safe, and therefore remaining in the Church of England, a man is safe. But, on the other hand, looking on the Church of Rome in all those points whereon she differs from England, there we see difference of opinion, there we see doubts, there we see questions of doubtful decision, on which the learned and the good are divided. And therefore it may be argued, that it is wiser and safer to remain in the Church of England, whose doctrines are universally admitted to be sound and true, than to leave her for the Church of Rome, whose peculiar doctrines are debated as well as debateable—questioned as well as questionable. To express the argument in few words—all the positive doctrines of the Church of England have the assent and sanction of the Church of Rome, as well as of the Church of England; in short, the approval of both Churches; whereas the peculiar doctrines of the Church of Rome have only the evidence and approval of herself. The testimony of both Churches is for the doctrines of the Church of England, while the testimony of both is at issue, at hopeless issue, as to the doctrines of the Church of Rome;—so that it may well be argued, that it is safer to remain in the Church of England.

The reply he made to this was of considerable length. He alluded to the different sects or divisions among Protestants. He described the Lutheran Church, he alluded to the Wesleyan body, he entered into details respecting those he called Calvinists, shewing that all these held also certain great and leading doctrines of the faith,—that these Churches, whether in Germany, or in France, or in Scotland, were in this particular analogous to the Church of England. They, like her, held certain great doctrines of the faith—they, like her, held perhaps all the principal doctrines of Catholic truth—they could boast, except perhaps in the point of the hierarchy, the Episcopacy, as much as she could, and therefore each and all of them, could argue for the safety of their communions on the very same principles as those on which I had argued for the safety within the Church of England. He developed this argument in detail, and then in a tone of triumph concluded, that if on my principle of arguing, the Church of England could be a safe communion, then all these Lutheran, Calvinistic, Wesleyan, Presbyterian Churches must be safe likewise. And they had thus as much right to regard themselves as the Catholic Church, as the Church of England herself, and thus we should arrive at the strange conclusion, that the Catholic Church was not one, but many, and thus alter the words of the creed—"The one holy Catholic Church," and read it,—"The many holy Catholic Churches."

The tone and manner of my friend shewed a full conviction that the question was disposed of for ever by this reasoning, expecting that I would have at once denounced those various Churches, and asserted that the Church of England was the alone Catholic Church. My reply, however, turned his position.

I said, that I had often observed an error pervading the minds of Roman Catholics, as to the real position which the Church of England claimed for herself—that I had frequently observed it among our mutual friends at Rome, and that it lay at the foundation of his present argument. The error was that which supposes that the Church of England claims to be THE Catholic Church, or THE Church of Christ, in an exclusive way. She presumes not to so exclusive a claim. She professes to be a branch—a part—a section of “the One holy Catholic and Apostolic Church” of Christ. She believes, that as anciently there was a Church at Jerusalem, a Church at Antioch, a Church in Galatia, a Church in Corinth, a Church in Rome, and there are other seven different Churches described in Asia ;—and as each of these was not singly and exclusively the Catholic Church of Christ, but only a branch, a part, a section of that Church,—so now the Church of England merely claims for herself to be considered in this subordinate position, not as the whole, but as a part of the whole Church. Now his whole argument was to the effect that if I claimed for the Church of England that she exclusively was THE Catholic Church, then I must unchurch the Lutherans, the Wesleyans, and the Calvinists, &c. ; or I must, by churching them, make, not one, but many Catholic Churches ; whereas not making any such claim for the Church of England, all his inference must vanish away. The truth is, that all these Communities or Churches were branches more or less fruitful, parts more or less sound, sections more or less extended, of the One holy Catholic and Apostolic Church of Christ. The truth is that we all claim the title of Churches, we all claim the title of Christian, we all claim membership with the Church of Christ. We, none of us, pretend to an exclusive claim ; and the Church of Rome stands alone in so strange and unproved a pretension.

Precisely so, I rejoined, the Church of England claims only to be regarded as a section of the Church of Christ—a member of the family of Churches. She claims to be a pure, scriptural, ancient, apostolical section, but still only a section, with her own forms, her own ritual, her own hierarchy ; and I feel that salvation may be found within her ; and I see not why you should state that it is not safe to remain in her. I say this on your own principles ; for since I came to Rome I have seen that your Church recognises the principle that there may be many Churches differing in forms, differing in rituals, differing in details, and yet they may all be true members of the One Church of Christ. I have myself witnessed here in Rome a remarkable illustration of this. I have witnessed the ritual of the Greek Church and the liturgy of the Armenian Church celebrated in their respective Churches in this city of Rome. I have witnessed in the Chapel of the College de Propagandâ Fide, the last Supper of our Lord celebrated according to the Chaldee, the Syrian, the Maronite, the Coptic, the Greek, the Armenian forms. I have witnessed the same in the Church of S. Andrea della Valle. All those forms vary one from another almost as widely as the Protestant differ from the Roman. And yet all these are exhibited at Rome, to shew that the Church of Rome recognises their orthodoxy and catholicity notwithstanding their diversity. If therefore your Church of Rome acknowledges the salvability of the members of those various Churches, though differing from her, she ought to be able to adduce very strong arguments indeed before she denies salvability to the members of the Church of England.

His answer to this was just what I had anticipated, as the same answer had repeatedly before been made to the same objection when I had urged it against others. He said that the Church of England was in a state of schism —that it was a schismatical Church. He said “heretical,” but immediately corrected himself as unwilling to seem unnecessarily discourteous. He said that those other Churches of the East which I had named, and whose various and varying rituals I had witnessed celebrated at the Propaganda, were not schismatical—that they acknowledged the primacy and authority of the successor in the chair of St. Peter—that they thus were in union and therefore in communion with the great Centre of Catholic Unity, and so were integral portions of the Catholic Church; so that though they adopted their own forms and ceremonies and rituals, thus differing in non-essentials, they were in union with the Catholic Church. But the Church of England was schismatical—had broken herself off from the Apostolic tree—had divorced herself from the Centre of Unity—had separated herself from the visible Catholic Church—and was thus schismatical.

I replied, that though the Church of England was separated from the Church Roman, yet she was not separated from the Church Catholic—that such at least was the view taken of this matter by all parties in England;—that the view generally taken was, that the Church Catholic was that vast community or sisterhood of Churches that comprehended all Christendom; and that the Church of England considered herself one of these—that the Church of Rome was regarded as another that had erred both in her ceremonies and in the faith, and that it did not belong to one section of the Church to excommunicate another section, as schismatical; for the charge was easy and sure to be retorted. I added that the great error or mistake of the Roman Controversialists was their assuming that their Church was the Catholic Church—not a section or member of it ;—but the Church Catholic herself.

He answered me, by saying, that the chair of St. Peter, now occupied by the Bishop of Rome, was the centre of unity to the whole Catholic Church—that though the Roman Catholic Church was not the whole Catholic Church, yet she was the centre of unity, so as that no Church could be a part or portion of the Church of Christ which was not in union with her—that the Church of England had once maintained that union—had been one with Rome, holding the same doctrines, the same discipline, and recognising her authority ; but that at the time of the Reformation she had separated, divorced herself from Rome, and had thus become schismatical.

I was prepared for this, and had my reply ready. I said, that he and his Church had already recognized in the several Churches, the inherent right to arrange and model their own forms, rites, &c,—that the exhibition of the varying rituals at the Propaganda established this as an acknowledged right,—and that the Church of England only claimed for herself that right which was thus acknowledged to exist in all other Churches. Now, I said with great emphasis, the Church of England, in the exercise of this her undoubted and admitted right, proceeded to remodel and reform some of her forms and rituals at the Reformation, and for this exercise of her right she was, contrary to all justice and charity, excommunicated by the Bishop of Rome. It is a great error to say, that the Church of England divorced herself from the Church of Rome. No, but the Church of Rome excommunicated the Church of England. The separation—the division—the schism, or whatever it be called, was the arbitrary act of the Bishop of Rome. The Council of Trent took it on them to anathematize all persons who held certain views on some disputed questions, and the Bishop of Rome, taking on himself to assert that the Church of England held those views, proceeded unjustly and uncharitably to anathematize and separate the whole Church of England. If therefore there be schism in the case, then the Bishop of Rome is its author, the great schismatic, who, by his arbitrary proceeding, has created this schism:

My friend replied to this with considerable vivacity. He said, as before, that the Church of England was herself the author of the schism—that she had originally received the gospel from Rome—that for ages she had faithfully held the religion she had thus received—that at the Reformation, and not till then, she broke away, cast off everything, embraced novelties, and avowed her schism and gloried in it. And as all this schism was the result of despotism—the despotism of one wicked man, and was caused by the worst passions of human nature, and as it was, notwithstanding such an origin, openly avowed by the Church of England, she deserved to be excommunicated—to be separated, and put out of the Catholic Church. All this was uttered, with much of the same nature, with great warmth, and then, moderating his tone and manner, he proceeded to say that it was very true that the time and manner in which Henry VIII was excommunicated by the Pope, and especially the step of excommunication itself, may have been unfortunate or injudicious, but yet it was deserved. All that was a mere question of policy and expediency, not of religion, and therefore it may be held that it was unwise and injudicious to have excommunicated Queen Elizabeth afterwards at that special time when it was done, but certainly she deserved it. It seems however now, that under all the circumstances it was bad policy, as it seems probable, that if another and different course had been adopted by the Court at Rome, the separation of England might have been prevented. The step, he added, was taken perhaps too hastily, and is now to be regretted, on account of its unhappy consequences.

I remarked that all this implied, that the separation was caused by the Pope of Rome, and his precipitate proceedings, and that therefore the charge of schism must lie against the Roman, rather than against the English branch of the Universal Church. One branch had no right to excommunicate the other. It was assuming for Rome that she was the Catholic Church herself, instead of being merely a section of it.

He replied, that the Church of Rome was not a section, but was the Catholic Church herself, to which the promises were made,—the Catholic Church which was founded by Christ Himself on St. Peter, saying, “Thou art Peter, and on this rock I will build my Church, &c,”—the Catholic Church to which he promised, “I will be with you always, to the end of the world.” The Church of Rome, he added emphatically, is that Church, and her head is the centre of Catholic unity—the infallible voice of Christ’s Church, and therefore the only Church in which there is safety.

Some friends were at this moment announced, and thus ended a conversation that had already continued for more than two hours. It was one of considerable difficulty—one in which I felt obliged to exercise more self-restraint than on any other occasion, to repress in myself both the spirit and appearance of a controversialist, while at the same time, the whole bearing and manner of my friendly opponent was both earnest and courteous in the extreme. He seemed as sincere in his opinions, as he was anxious to persuade me, and appeared at times to feel the difficulties with which he had to contend.

CHAPTER VII.

INVITATION TO A POLEMICAL DISCUSSION—THE PROHIBITION OF THE SCRIPTURES FOR SALE AT ROME—UNIVERSAL IGNORANCE OF THE SACRED VOLUME—SALVATION ONLY IN THE CHURCH OF ROME—INFALLIBILITY OF THE POPES NECESSARY TO BE BELIEVED—WHETHER THERE BE SALVATION IN THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND—THE CHURCH OF ROME HAS NEVER CLAIMED INFALLIBILITY.

A COMMUNICATION had been made to me to the effect, that the reverend professor of Dogmatic Theology wished to have a theological discussion with me. Whether this arose from a hope, that he might prove a means of making a proselyte of me, or from a desire for a controversial conference with me, in consequence of our previous collision in the Collegio Romano, it is not for me to state. A communication had been made to me by a clerical friend of the Church of England, that the professor had expressed himself thus desirous of a meeting ; and a formal message, with an invitation or challenge to a theological discussion, was afterwards conveyed to me by the reverend professor of Canon Law. I gladly accepted it ; I felt it might prove a new and additional source of information, as to the real nature of the Church of Rome, and the arguments by which she is supported ; though I certainly felt rather nervous at the prospect of a controversy with two of the most able and subtle of the order of Jesuits. A brother clergyman was with me, and we knelt together and prayed with earnestness, for the light and grace of which we felt in need.

On the appointed day we knelt together in prayer—and soon afterwards the professor of Canon Law, and the professor of Dogmatic Theology were announced. At first our conversation was of a general character, but soon turned to those subjects which were congenial to all our feelings.

Some remarks had been made by me designedly on the subject of the Holy Scriptures, with a view to directing our conversation into a profitable channel ; and I took occasion to remark on the ignorance of the Holy Scriptures, so prevalent among the people of Italy—so prevalent indeed, that it was impossible to argue with them ; and that it seemed to English minds, a practical illustration of that which was so often asserted in England, namely, that the Church of Rome was opposed to the circulation of the sacred volume.

The professor of Dogmatic Theology replied by saying, that although it was very true that the people were wholly unacquainted with the nature of the Holy Scriptures, yet it was very incorrect to suppose that the Catholic Church was opposed to their reading them—that the Church set a great value on the sacred volume, and venerated it too highly to let it be used commonly or indiscriminately—that so far from forbidding its circulation and perusal, the Church permitted it to all, whom she thought likely to profit by it ; and forbade it only to those who, being ignorant, would be likely to pervert and misapply it ; but that it was a great mistake, and indeed a calumny against the Catholic Church, to say that she was opposed to the full and unrestricted use and circulation of the Scriptures.

The answer I made to this was, that having resided many years among a Roman Catholic population in Ireland, I had always found that the sacred volume was forbidden to them ; and that since I came to Italy, and especially to Rome, I observed the most complete ignorance of the Holy Scriptures, and that it was ascribed by themselves to a prohibition on the part of the Church.

He at once stated that there must be some mistake, as the book was permitted to all who could understand it, and was in fact, in very general circulation in Rome.

I said that I had heard the contrary, and that it was impossible to procure a copy of the Holy Scriptures in the Italian tongue, in the city of Rome—that I had so heard from an English gentleman, who had resided there for ten years—that I looked upon the statement as scarcely credible—that I wished much to ascertain the matter for my own information—that I had one day resolved to test this by visiting every bookselling establishment in the city of Rome—that I had gone to the book-shop belonging to the Propaganda Fide—to that patronised by his holiness the Pope—to that which was connected with the Collegio Romano, and was patronised by the order of Jesuits—to that which was established for the supply of English and other foreigners—to those which sold old and second-hand books—and that in every establishment without exception, I found that the Holy Scriptures were not for sale. I could not procure a single copy in the Roman language and of a portable size, in the whole city of Rome ; and that when I asked each bookseller the reason of his not having so important a volume, I was answered in every instance, é prohibito, or non é permesso ;—that the volume was prohibited, or that it was not permitted to be sold. I added that Martini's edition was offered to me in two places, but it was in twenty-four volumes, and at a cost of 105 francs, (that is, four pounds sterling) and that under such circumstances I could not but regard the Holy Scriptures as a prohibited book, at least in the city of Rome.

He replied, by acknowledging that it was very probable, that I could not find the volume in Rome, especially as the population of Rome was very poor, and not able to purchase the sacred volume ; and that the real reason the Scriptures were not at the booksellers, and also were not in circulation, was, not that they were forbidden or prohibited by the Church, but that the people of Rome were too poor to buy them.

I replied, that they probably were too poor, whether in Rome or in England, to give 105 francs for the book ; but that the clergy of Rome, so numerous and wealthy, should do as we did in England,—namely,—form an association for cheapening the copies of the Scriptures.

He said in reply, that the priests were too poor to cheapen the volume, and that the people were too poor to purchase it.

I then stated that if this was really the case—that if there was no prohibition against the sacred volume—that if they would be willing to circulate it, and that really and sincerely there was no other objection than the difficulty arising from the price of the book, that difficulty should at once be obviated. I would myself undertake to obtain from England through the Bible Society, any number of Bibles that could be circulated, and that they should be sold at the lowest possible price,—or given freely and gratuitously to the inhabitants of Rome. I stated that the people of England loved the Scriptures beyond all else in this world, and that it would be to them a source of delight and thanksgiving to give for gratuitous circulation, any number of copies of the sacred volume that the inhabitants of Rome could require.

He immediately answered, that he thanked me for the generous offer, but that there would be no use in accepting it, as the people of Rome were very ignorant—were in a state of brutal ignorance—were unable to read anything, and therefore could not profit by reading the Scriptures, even if we supplied them gratuitously.

I could not conceal from myself, that he was prevaricating with me—that his former excuse of poverty, and this latter excuse of ignorance, were mere evasions. So I asked him, whose fault it was, that the people remained in such universal and unaccountable ignorance. There were above five thousand priests, monks, and nuns, beside cardinals and prelates, in the city of Rome, that the whole population was only thirty thousand families—that thus there was a priest, or monk, or nun, for every six families in Rome—that thus there was ample means for the education of the people, and I asked therefore, whether the Church was not to blame for this ignorance on the part of the people?

He immediately turned from the subject, saying, that the Church held the infallibility of the Pope; to whom it therefore belonged, to give the only infallible interpretation of the Scriptures.

This led the conversation in another direction. If I had prevented this, it would have given me the appearance of a partisan, as if I were chiefly anxious to prove and fasten a fault upon the Church of Rome, instead of one who was searching for information, and was entering on a friendly rather than a controversial conversation. I allowed him therefore to lead me to the question of infallibility, feeling that it was a subject which might be turned to the advantage of truth.

I therefore remarked, somewhat carelessly in manner, that I believed, or at least had heard, that there was much difference of opinion in the Church of Rome, as to the seat of infallibility—that I had heard of some asserting it to reside in the Popes,—that others held it resided in General Councils, while others still maintained, that infallibility was the exclusive possession of the Church in general. I said that as far as I could form a judgment upon such a subject, the preponderance in the argument was in favor of those who claimed it for the Popes—that generally all the various advocates seemed to me to argue very powerfully, when disproving the positions of their opponents, but became singularly weak when endeavoring to establish their own ; but still I thought the weight of argument was in favor of the Pope.

The professor, my opponent, seemed delighted with this admission ; and seemed to take courage from it to express himself very strongly, saying in the broadest and clearest terms, that no man could be a true Catholic—a true member of that Church, out of which there is no salvation, who did not believe in the entire supremacy and infallibility of the Popes as successors of St. Peter.

I replied that such a sentiment was by no means universal — that it was so far from being held by the Roman Catholics of England and Ireland, that they would look on it as illiberal and untrue,—that they did not hold it, and that no man in those countries would assert that none could be saved unless in the Church of Rome.

He said that it was impossible my statement could be correct, as no man was a true Catholic, who thought that any one could find salvation out of the Church of Rome. They could not be true Catholics.

I answered, that they seemed as zealous and as true as others, and that there could be no mistake as to my statement, for that some of the priests in England and Ireland had often, in conversation with myself, denied the doctrine of exclusive salvation ; and that I had known some of the priests make the same statement in the most public manner.

He again exclaimed, that it was impossible ; no true Catholic could say so ; and if any one said it he was not a true Catholic.

I repeated my words, adding that I heard it too often to be mistaken—that the people of England hated exclusiveness, and bigotry, and narrowness of mind—that the Roman Catholic priests when entering on controversy, were therefore always anxious to disclaim all notions of exclusive salvation for the Church of Rome ; and that I had myself been repeatedly a witness to such disclaimers, so that there could be no mistake. Whether they were sincere in such disclaimers, it was not for me to say ; but all those among them who aimed at any popular influence always disclaimed it. One priest, a Mr. Esmonde, whom I heard disclaiming it on a public platform, was a member of the order of the Jesuits, and therefore I suppose a true Catholic member of the Church of Rome.

He again said with vehemence, that it was impossible ; such persons were not true Catholics, and certainly were a great injury to the Church. The truth of the Church was, that no man could be saved unless he was a member of the Church of Rome, and believed in the supremacy and infallibility of the Pope.

He reiterated the same sentiment in language still stronger than before, adding that every one must be damned in the flames of Hell, who did not believe in the supremacy and infallibility of the Pope.

I could not but smile at all this, while I felt it derived considerable importance from the position of the person who uttered it. He was the chief teacher of Theology, in the order of the Jesuits, and the chosen professor of Theology in the Collegio Romano—the university of Rome. I smiled, however, and reminded him, that his words were consigning all the people of England to the damnation of Hell.

He repeated his words emphatically, and with some assumption of manner, as if he thought he could overawe or frighten me by the statement. He said that the people of England would all certainly be damned eternally in Hell, unless they embraced the doctrine of the infallibility of the Pope. He looked at me with an air of triumph.

“ And what,” said I, “ what is to become of me ? I do not hold, nor can I hold that doctrine ; and do you consign me, and numbers of others like me, to everlasting damnation, because I do not hold it ? ”

He did not hesitate a moment in answering, that I could not be saved,—that when once I had the opportunity and the power of hearing the truth, and being informed of it, I could not be saved if I did not receive it. But that if I had not the opportunity and power, he could not speak so decisively.

I then looked at him with much seriousness, and spoke with great deliberation, saying, that truth—the truth of God was the great object of my researches, and that I felt that the whole world was nothing in comparison with it—that I had read the Holy Scriptures of God—that I had read the controversial writings of Cardinal Bellarmine, Bossuet, and all the ablest controversialists of the Church of Rome—that I had read also the works of the ablest English writers in answer to them—that for many years I had been seeking a mastery over the intricacies of these questions—that I had come to Rome to obtain a personal inspection of the Church at its fountain-head—that I had many and long conferences with several priests in Rome on the subject, and that I was absolutely constrained, on a balance of the arguments, not only not to believe, but to reject altogether, the doctrine of the supremacy and infallibility of the Pope,—that I therefore was one, who had enjoyed every opportunity and power of adequate information on the point, and considering that I had arrived fairly and honestly, and to the best of my judgment, and to the conviction of my conscience, at the conclusion to reject this doctrine, I asked him whether he would still consign me to the damnation of Hell? I spoke with a grave look, and in a solemn manner, to prevent trifling on so important a question.

He hesitated and said, that if I had indeed used all possible diligence as I intimated ; and if I still found my prejudices invincible—if I was still invincibly ignorant, he would not speak too decidedly. He was unwilling to do so. The Church had made an exception in such a case, but he hoped I should yet see and believe it. His manner in all this shewed that his natural courtesy alone prevented his declaring a decided judgment.

I felt that quite enough had been said upon this point ; I obtained the judgment of one professor very clearly, and observed that the other professor did not contradict him in the least ; so I suggested that we should turn to some other subject.

He immediately proposed to me, to argue the question of the possibility of salvation in the Church of England ; suggesting that as no one could be saved out of the Church of Rome, he would prove that no one could be saved in the Church of England ; asking me to enter on the question, and undertaking on his part to prove against me that the Church of England was not the Church of Christ ; and that while I continued a member of the Church of England, I could not be saved. It was a formal challenge.

I replied, that I could not assert that the Church of England was the Church of Christ ;—that I believed and held she was a part, a member, a branch of the Church of Christ—that she held all necessary truth, and that salvation was to be found within her, and that I was prepared to maintain thus far, but no farther. I could not defend the proposition in the form in which he proposed it.

He said that he would shape his argument so as to embrace that view, and then, before he commenced, we agreed that nothing should be asserted respecting the doctrines of either Church, by either him or myself, without producing the canon, or decree, or bull, or article of the Church, containing it. He was not to claim for the Church of Rome, nor to ascribe to the Church of England, anything whatever without producing the authoritative canon of one Church, or the authoritative article of the other. I was pledged in the same way ; and thus it was so arranged that there should be no railing accusations, no undue assertions, no claims on one hand, or charges on the other, no assertions or denials ; but all was to proceed on the authoritative documents of the respective Churches. I was careful to have this settled between us before proceeding further, as I perceived he was disposed to enter on the question, more as a practised and confident controversialist, than as a sincere enquirer. He seemed a bold, lively, warm-hearted man, experienced in the disputation of the college, and confident in his own resources, and he seemed to have sought me rather in a youthful spirit of emulation, and desire for a polemical tournament. He wished to try his prowess and break a lance with me, and that too in no unkindly or ungenerous spirit. I resolved therefore to meet him, so as to shew him that the argument was not so clearly with him as he had imagined, and that he might find in me his equal in argument, though certainly far from being his equal either in talent or in learning.

He commenced, according to the method still practised in the classes of the college, namely, that of arguing in the form of a syllogism. He said—

The Church of Christ is infallible.

The Church of England confesses herself fallible.

Therefore the Church of England is not the Church of Christ.

I at once pointed out the fallacy or error of his argument, shewing, as I had already stated, that the Church of England did not pretend to be the Church of Christ, but only a part or branch or member of it—and that the fallibility of a part of the Church, was no proof she was not a part of the Church, to which only, as a whole, infallibility could belong.

He acknowledged this to be sufficient, and said he would state his argument in another form.

The Church of Christ, in all her parts, is infallible.

Therefore the Church of England is not a part of the Church of Christ.

I answered that the syllogism was as faulty as the preceding one, but that I would at once meet it by denying his minor; that is, by denying that the Protestant Church of England confesses herself to be fallible: I was not aware that she had made such a confession.

He laughed at me good-humouredly, and with a look of triumph, and said that the Church of England had confessed it, and he could produce the article. He referred me to the Article XIX.

I produced the Article and read the words, “As the Churches of Jerusalem, Alexandria and Antioch have erred, so also the Church of Rome hath erred, not only in their living and manner of ceremonies, but also in matters of faith.” I said that this Article of the Church of England asserted that other Churches, and the Church of Rome in particular, had erred, and were fallible, but that she had said nothing of herself; and certainly had not, as his argument supposed and required, confessed herself fallible.

He frankly acknowledged this to be a sufficient answer, and that his argument had failed, but said he would arrange his syllogism in another form, so as to obviate this. He seemed however slightly—very slightly annoyed, at finding himself so easily foiled in his first two attempts. He proceeded with great quickness to arrange his argument again.

The Protestant Church of England does not claim to be infallible.

Therefore the Church of England is not the Church of Christ.

The ordinary mode of replying to this, would have been by denying the major, namely, that the Church in all its parts claimed to be infallible; and this would have opened the whole question of the infallibility of the Church, whether as a whole, in the Church general, or in a part, as the Church of England. I felt however in my secret soul, that there was another mode of dealing with it. I had in years long past pondered the matter well and thoughtfully, and many years' experience and research alike confirmed my feeling. I had never expressed it in private, nor had I employed it in public: and I thought that the present was an occasion the most fitting possible to advance it. I knew that my present controversy was with an able and learned man, and not only so, but was with one of the best-informed Jesuits in Rome, assisted by another member of the same order, profoundly versed in the Canon Law, and therefore peculiarly competent to deal with my argument. I felt therefore disposed to try it. I am free to confess that I was somewhat nervous in advancing a position so utterly untried, especially considering the talents and learning of my opponents ; but I felt that He, whose I was and whom I desired to serve, and who had hitherto so wonderfully sustained me in many an arduous struggle, would turn my success or failure to some good account, by which His truth would be manifested and his gospel glorified. So after some moments' pause for reflection, I requested my opponent to repeat, and kindly to write, his syllogism on paper.

He wrote it as follows.

The Church of Christ, in all her parts, claims to be infallible.

The Church of England does not claim to be infallible. Therefore the Church of England is no part of the Church of Christ.

Having read it carefully, I drew my pen over the word “ England,” in the minor and in the conclusion, and writing the word “ Rome ” in its stead, I returned the paper as my answer. It was as follows—

The Church of Christ, in all her parts, claims to be infallible.

The Church of Rome does not claim to be infallible. Therefore the Church of Rome is no part of the Church of Christ.

On handing it to him in this altered form, I remarked quietly that if his syllogism was legitimate as against the Church of England, it must be equally legitimate against the Church of Rome ; and that therefore he could not deny its conclusiveness.

The moment he read it he laughed heartily but good-humouredly at me, and said that the Church of Rome did claim infallibility ; and expressed surprise at my minor, containing a statement so palpably incorrect, and therefore so easily confuted, His companion joined him in his merriment, and they both seemed to rejoice in a victory so easily and so completely gained.

I was in no other degree affected by this, than to feel thankful that it gave me a little space to collect myself, and to express my argument with precision ; I therefore calmly reminded my friends, that the Church of Rome had never on any occasion asserted her own infallibility ; —that some of her members, and some of her advocates, some of her individual divines had, without any authority from her, claimed and asserted it for her and in her name ; but that she had never in any form whatever, either claimed or asserted it herself.

They replied with one voice, that the Church of Rome had always and in all places claimed and asserted her infallibility—that it was frequently done ; and so well known and so universally recognized and admitted, that they wondered how I could mean to question it. They spoke with evident surprise, marvelling how I could think of making so strange and unusual an assertion ; and their surprise seemed so natural, that even though they were Jesuits, I felt they were sincere. They were really and truly surprised.

I answered with cool and deliberate words, shewing by my manner, that I was conscious of the truth and reality of my position, and that I could not be turned from it by a laugh. I answered that there was no Decree of any General Council—that there was no Bull of any Pope—that there was no Canon or Article of an authoritative nature in the Church of Rome, which asserted or claimed infallibility for that Church. I reminded them, that this my statement was clear and explicit, that it was of such a nature, that if it was untrue or founded on an untruth, it could most easily be confuted ; and all they had to do was, that which I now challenged them to do—to name the Decree of any Council, or the Bull of any Pope, or the authoritative Canon or Article, which claimed or asserted infallibility for their Church. I added that the terms of our present conference required, that as he claimed infallibility for his Church, he should produce the authoritative document asserting that claim, or he should at least state when and where it was authoritatively asserted.

After some moments' pause, he said he could produce several instances, and named the Council of Constance, the Council of Basil, the Council of Florence, and several other lesser authorities. I knew each of the decrees to which he referred ; and therefore when he said that one asserted the supremacy of the Church of Rome, as the mother and mistress of all Churches ; and that another held that every soul was subject to the Roman Pontiff at the peril of his salvation ; and that others still asserted, that every man must be obedient, and owed obedience to the successor of St. Peter ; and others again that it belonged to the Church of Rome to interpret Holy Scripture—when he said all this, I reminded him that all this was beside the real question—was nothing to the real point before us—that my assertion was, that no received Decree or Bull, or other authoritative document of the Church of Rome claimed infallibility ; and that he answered me only, by producing some which claimed supremacy and authority.

He said, that supremacy and authority implied infallibility.

I answered by an emphatic—No! I said that in England we felt that the law of the land was supreme and authoritative—that we often felt that a specified law was a bad law,—a mischievous law, a law that ought never to have been enacted, and ought immediately to be repealed ; but bad and mischievous as we might think it, we yet felt it was still the law of the land, and was therefore possessed of a supremacy and authority to which we were bound to yield obedience. But though we ascribe to the law, and to the legislative power of the nation, a supremacy and authority, we prove by our efforts to repeal the obnoxious law, that we do not ascribe infallibility to it. I then said that all the Decrees, Bulls, Canons, &c. to which they referred me, only asserted such a supremacy and authority, as demanded the subjection and obedience of men to the Church of Rome, or to the Pope as its head ; but not one of them claimed or asserted infallibility for any party.

My opponent here did not deny the principle I had thus laid down, but he seemed puzzled and perplexed, at finding that all his documents failed in the precise point of asserting infallibility. He referred to several others, which he had not already named ; but in a moment after, he gave them up as inadequate ; all, when examined, were disposed of by my preceding answer.

I shall never forget, while I live, the spectacle of these two Jesuits, able, learned, and subtle as they were, and long habituated to controversy, yet so completely perplexed at this turn of the argument, as to be looking at one another, and consulting and endeavoring to find an answer sufficiently plausible. My opponent, the reverend professor of Theology, seemed a little cast down at first, but soon rallied, and laughed at the perplexity and singularity of his position. He laughed good-naturedly, no longer at me but at himself, and honestly said he had never seen the difficulty before—that he had thought the point clearly settled, but that it certainly was not so,—and that he could not see how to answer me.

His companion, however, the reverend professor of Canon Law, was not so good-humoured on the occasion. He was excited and annoyed at the failure, and asked confidently and warmly—why it was that Protestants were always charging the Church of Rome with arrogance and presumption and blasphemy, for claiming infallibility, if, as would now appear from the argument, she has never claimed it; and why should it be made by me and others like me, a ground of charge against her, if we really believed she was not liable to that charge? And he asked somewhat warmly, whether my habit of advancing this charge, was not a sufficient proof that I believed that the Church of Rome really claimed infallibility?

I was unwilling to reply to this in the warm spirit in which it was spoken, and I merely said that I had never objected to the Church of Rome, that she had been arrogant or presumptuous, or blasphemous in claiming infallibility, or even that she ever claimed it or pretended to it at all. I believed that, as a Church, she never on any occasion whatever had advanced such a claim; I knew indeed that her advocates usually claimed it for her ; and that her controversialists generally asserted it for her ; and that the multitude imagined she both claimed and possessed that divine prerogative ; but I also knew that they were not THE CHURCH—that a few learned advocates were not the Church—that a few subtle controversialists were not the Church—that the multitude of an ignorant people were not the Church—and I knew also that the CHURCH herself had never claimed or asserted it. If I was wrong in this broad statement, I was in presence of those who could easily correct me. They could tell me when and where THE CHURCH had claimed or asserted it. They could name the Council and point to the Decree. They could designate the Pope and point to the Bull. There never was an assertion more easily confuted, if indeed it was capable of being confuted at all.

They still asserted that the Church was infallible, and claimed to be infallible, though they seemed in a quiet way to acknowledge that they could not further prove their position.

I reminded them, that by the terms arranged for our conference, they had no right to claim anything as a doctrine of their Church, unless they could name or produce the authoritative Decree, Bull, Canon, or Article which asserted it ; and that on the present occasion they assumed infallibility, as claimed and decreed by the Church, but had altogether failed in adducing the authority for their statement ; and then I added, that under those circumstances I had a right to argue, that if a Church's not claiming to be infallible, was evidence that it was not the Church of Christ, then the Church of Rome, from the circumstance of this deficiency, could not be any part of the Church of Christ ; so I asked them how they liked their own process of argument.

I must say in justice to both these gentlemen, that they bore themselves with good temper, and Christian good humor, in this trying and difficult position ; and although at first they seemed to feel keenly, though kindly, their difficulty, yet they joined us—the three others who were present—in a laugh at the singularity, and unexpected awkwardness of the position, in which by their own process of argument they were placed.

Our conversation soon took a more general turn, and did not revert to the main subject proposed for our conference. We soon after separated.

When a short time afterwards we met again, it was to consider whether the mass was a true and proper and propitiatory sacrifice for the sins of the living and the dead, as stated in the canons of the Council of Trent. Our meeting was at the invitation of the reverend professor of Dogmatic Theology, and our argument became unprofitable, and uninteresting to the unlearned, owing to our time being spent chiefly on the question, whether the words “ ministering to the Lord,” in Acts xiii. 2, meant sacrificing or ministering in the ordinary sense of the word. He asserted that it meant sacrificing in the strictness of that word. I maintained that the word was in several places in Scripture applied, even to secular magistrates, whose work and office did not imply or involve the idea of sacrifice. He acknowledged this, but stated that my argument applied only to the word “ ministering,” whereas his argument was that the words “ ministering to the Lord,” had another meaning, and involved the idea of offering sacrifice.

We soon after parted, and it never was my good fortune to have the pleasure of again meeting the professor of Theology—except when, on hearing of my approaching departure from Rome, he came to bid me farewell. I was much pleased by his manner, and gratified by his kindness. He spoke with earnestness, and I replied with some words of warm feeling and Christian anxiety. I trust that our meeting and our parting were not without profit to us both.

NOTE.

IN the entire range of controversy between the Churches of England and Rome, there is no one point more frequently and zealously debated than—The Infallibility of the Church of Rome.

All, who have had much personal experience of this controversy, are aware that, as the advocates of Protestantism generally fall back on the Infallibility of the Holy Scriptures as their best and surest defence, so the advocates of Romanism usually retreat upon the alleged Infallibility of the Church of Rome as their best and safest refuge.

I have long felt that this claim to Infallibility on the behalf of the Church of Rome, was a fiction—that that Church herself had never held it, had never asserted it, had never promulgated it,—that it had been invented by her defeated advocates to cover their own failure—the mere device of ingenious and subtle advocates, who, failing in all their arguments, have invented this notion, as a dernier resort,—as a last retreat.

In the foregoing conversation this point was brought to issue. I stated, that the Church of Rome has never held, asserted, or claimed her own Infallibility—that she has not taught it in any authentic Decree of a Council, nor claimed it in any authoritative Bull of a Pope—that a belief in her Infallibility is thus no declared Article of Faith in that Church, and that therefore her advocates have no right to defend the assertion of a claim on her behalf which she has never asserted for herself, and which she has never announced to her members.

My position is, that so far as the belief and the claims of the Church of Rome are to be learned from her own authorized and authoritative declarations, she does not claim, and does not believe in her own Infallibility.

That this position has come with surprise upon many of the advocates of Protestantism I am well aware. That it has fallen with no less surprise upon the advocates of Romanism, is no more than natural. But the result—namely, a full admission on the part of my opponents, as to the substantial truth and certainty of my position—will be to many a source of surprise, greater, and more satisfactory than all.

My opponents in England, after communicating with my opponents at Rome, have issued the following statement. It is given in its completeness, verbatim, as published by themselves.

“ One of the most novel portions of Mr. Seymour’s book is his account of the way in which he makes it appear that the Jesuits admitted that the Catholic Church does not claim infallibility.

As it happens, Father Mazio, before he had read Mr. Seymour's account of the conversation, had mentioned to us Mr. Seymour's conduct on the morning when this subject was discussed, as strikingly shewing the dishonesty and captiousness of his mind. Comparing his account with Mr. Seymour's, we find that the latter has studiously concealed the greater portion of the reply which was made to his charge against the Church of Rome. Mr. Seymour positively declares that his opponent was unable to shew him that the Church does claim infallibility, and therefore is not the true Church of Christ. He insisted upon having shewn him the particular words of some document absolutely binding upon all Catholics, in which it is dogmatically stated that the Catholic Church is infallible.

" Now, those who are really acquainted with the facts of Catholic history and discipline are aware that the only documents to which all Catholics are absolutely bound are the decrees of Councils, and the subsequent dogmatic bulls. And it is quite true that in these documents there is no precise dogmatic statement on the subject of the infallibility of the Church. And therefore, when Mr. Seymour, starting aside from the real questions under discussion, insisted on receiving nothing less than such a decree as a proof that the Church really held the doctrine, the Jesuit Fathers of course told him there was none such. The Father, however, who was, through the interpretation of his companion, arguing with Mr. Seymour, immediately pointed out to him that the Church herself never professes to hold and teach only what is stated in her documents of absolute authority. He told him—we again quote Father Mazio—" that the Church expresses her claim to infallibility by all her dogmatic facts and documents in which this principle and tenet is either implied, supposed, embodied, alluded to, insisted upon, or more or less expressed. She has expressed such a claim by the implicit belief which she has always exacted in all her doctrines and dogmatic decrees, under penalty of falling off from faith, and of damnation; just in the same manner as the Apostles proceeded, who were avowedly endowed with the gift of infallibility. She has expressed it by her method of condemning and anathematising all who raised the least doubt on any of her doctrines, never allowing what has been once defined by her to be called in question again. She has expressed it in all those documents in which she has declared, through her general Councils and Popes, that she is protected by Christ and guided by the Holy Ghost, always appealing to the Divine promises, that the gates of hell shall not prevail either against her or her doctrine. She has expressed it by the voice of so many of her fathers, who have borne testimony expressly, or in equivalent terms, to her unerring authority, conferred upon her in matters of faith and morals, though no formal dogmatic definition exists, because this is not necessary to constitute any thing an article of faith. ‘That, and that only’ (says Veron, in The Rule of Catholic Faith, c. i. § 1), is an article of Catholic faith which has been revealed in the word of God, and proposed by the Catholic Church to all her children, as necessary to be believed with divine faith. Whether a doctrine be proposed by a general Council, and confirmed by its definitive decree, or rest on the universal agreement of the faithful, its authority is the same. The above rule comprises two parts: the first requiring that a doctrine, to be received as an article of faith, be revealed by Almighty God; the second, that it be taught by the Church, either in her general Councils by an express and definitive decree, or practically confirmed by the unanimous assent of the pastors of the Church and the faithful. The second condition, however, presupposes the first’ (so continues at § 2); ‘for as Christ promised his Church the assistance of his Holy Spirit to teach her and lead her into all truth, it is impossible—unless, as they cannot, these promises fail—that this heavenly-guided Church can ever propose any thing as revealed which really has not been so.’ . . . When, therefore, we are asked, how does the Roman Church express her claim to infallibility, since there is no definitive decree of hers on the point, we answer, she does it just in the same way, by the same channels, as the Church of God, the Catholic Church, has ever done in every age.”

“Now all this Mr. Seymour, in his professed account of the conversation, slurs over or entirely omits. He would have us believe that the Jesuits were actually silenced by him; that the idea he urged was a novelty to them; that it was the first time in their lives they had ever reflected on the fact that the Church has never formally decreed her own infallibility; in short, that if they would have but followed out the difficulty he so acutely brought forward, they would at this moment have been Protestants of the stamp of Mr. Hobart Seymour himself! In fact, he has discovered a mare's nest, and none but those who are agape for every wonderment and absurdity which can be concocted against the Jesuits, will discern any thing in the affair except a proof of Mr. Seymour's want of candour in argument and of honesty in narration. Those who would know how strongly and repeatedly the Catholic Church has implied and asserted her claim to infallibility—though she has not issued any formal decree—need but read the canons and decrees of the Council of Trent, or the Catechism of the same Council. The Catechism, indeed, does positively assert that the Church is infallible; and considering how great is its authority, its declaration comes as nearly as possible to a distinct dogmatic decree, absolutely binding on all the faithful. “Etenim Spiritus Sanctus,” says the Tridentine Catechism, “qui Ecclesiæ præsidet, eam non per aliud genus ministrorum quam per apostolicum gubernat. Qui Spiritus primum quidem apostolis tributus est, deinde vero summa Dei benignitate semper in Ecclesia mansit. Sed quemadmodum hœc una Ecclesia errare non potest in fidei ac morum disciplina tradenda, cum a Spiritu Sancto gubernetur, ita cæteras omnes, quæ sibi Ecclesiæ nomen arrogant, ut quæ diaboli spiritu ducantur, in doctrinæ et morum perniciosissimis erroribus versari necesse est.” (De Symb. Fid. art. ix. c. 19.) These words also, it will be observed, not only assert that the Church is infallible, but declare from what source her enemies, such as Mr. Seymour, draw their inspiration.”

There appears upon the face of all this the admission—the full and open admission, that the Church of Rome has never formally defined, and claimed infallibility. There is no authoritative Decree of any Council—no authoritative Bull of any Pope, asserting the infallibility of the Church of Rome. This is the very position I desired to establish.

And this is the clear admission of my opponents. They say;—

“ The only documents to which all Catholics are absolutely bound are the Decrees of Councils, and the subsequent dogmatic Bulls. And it is quite true that in this document there is no precise dogmatic statement on the subject of the infallibility of the Church, and therefore when Mr. Seymour, starting aside from the real questions under discussion, insisted on receiving nothing less than such a Decree as a proof that the Church really held the doctrine, the Jesuit Fathers of course told him THERE WAS NONE SUCH.”

Here is the broad admission that the members of the Church of Rome are bound absolutely to believe only certain Decrees and Bulls. And that in those Decrees and Bulls which alone bind them, there is no claim of infallibility for that Church. The inference is inevitable, namely, that the notion of the infallibility of the Church is not an article of faith, but a mere matter of opinion, an open question among the members of that Church.

But while this important point is thus fully admitted, yet in order to lessen the force of the admission, and to weaken the inferences deducible from it, it is intimated that although the infallibility of the Roman Church is not defined, settled, or claimed in any authoritative Decree or Bull, yet it is implied and supposed somewhere else. They say—

“ The Church expresses her claim to infallibility by all her dogmatic facts and documents, in which this principle and tenet is either implied, supposed, embodied, alluded to, insisted upon, or more or less expressed.”

It is evident here, that being unable to prove the claim to infallibility by the Decrees and Bulls which are AUTHORITATIVE, we are referred to that class of “ Facts and Documents," which are NOT AUTHORITATIVE. And then having come to this non-authoritative source, we are informed, not that this infallibility is clearly defined, settled, claimed as an article of the faith of Rome to be received and believed by her members, but only that it is therein "implied, supposed, embodied, alluded to, insisted upon, or more or less expressed." In other words, it is confessedly no more than an implication, a supposition, an allusion, in documents confessedly not authoritative!

But if it be intended to convey the impression that although this doctrine is neither asserted nor claimed in the authoritative Decrees and Bulls, yet that it is implied or supposed or alluded to in them—if it be intended to convey this, then I answer by saying—Let them name or produce such authoritative Decree or Bull. My opponents at Rome had every opportunity for producing such, if they were in existence. They did produce some claiming authority and supremacy for their Church, and they produced them specifically as "implying" infallibility, but they afterwards withdrew them as inadequate, as stated in the foregoing narrative of the discussion. And now, if my opponents in England are aware of any authoritative Decree "implying, supposing, embodying" the infallibility of Rome,—if they know of any authoritative Bull "alluding to it, insisting upon it, or expressing it," let them name or produce it.

But they can neither name the one, nor produce the other. And they know it. Conscious—entirely conscious that they can adduce nothing that bears the least resemblance of authority, or could stand the least examination—conscious that they have no document whatever compiled or written by anything that has the shadow of authority, they now tell us as their best excuse and last resort, that there is no necessity for any Bull or Decree, or any written document whatever. In other words there is no necessity for any written evidence ! They say—

“ Whether a doctrine be proposed by a General Council, and confirmed by its definitive decree—or, rest on the universal agreement of the faithful, its authority is the same. The above rule comprises two parts : the first requiring that a doctrine, to be received as an article of faith, be revealed by Almighty God ; the second, that it be taught by the Church, either in her General Councils by an express and definitive decree, or, practically confirmed by the unanimous assent of the pastors of the Church and the faithful.”

“ When, therefore, we are asked,—How does the Roman Church express her claim to infallibility, since there is no definitive decree of hers on the point, we answer, she does it just in the same way, by the same channels, as the Church of God, the Catholic Church, has ever done in every age.”

It is here plainly admitted that the Church of Rome has “ no definitive decree on the subject ” of infallibility. It is also plainly admitted that there is nothing for it but unwritten evidence—a supposed agreement of the faithful ! And finally, in a sentence which clearly recognises the fact that the Church of Rome is not identical with the Catholic Church, it is stated the Church of Rome claims infallibility in the same way as “ the Church of God, the Catholic Church,” has ever claimed it. The same might be said of the Episcopal Church of England—of the Presbyterian Church of Scotland—of all the Churches of Christendom. They have all been silent alike !

The reference to the Tridentine Catechism is neutralised by their own admission that it is not of absolute authority.

And I am therefore spared the necessity of dealing further with the argument attempted to be founded on it.

It now only remains for me to notice the statement, that I had no right to require authoritative Decrees and Bulls in determining this question.

The facts and the reasons are simply these. For some years past, many and grave charges have been advanced against the Church of Rome. She has been accused of holding that faith is not to be kept with heresies—that heresies may be persecuted even to death—that sin may be committed, when for the advantage of the Church—that the Pope has power to release subjects from their oaths of allegiance—that he has authority from heaven to depose heretical, Protestant, or disobedient monarchs. These and many other fearful things have been imputed to the Church of Rome. And many historical facts are adduced, and many theological writers of the Church of Rome are cited as evidences of the truth of these charges.

The answer, with which all these accusations have been met, has been a broad denial, accompanied by a demand or challenge to produce the authoritative Decrees of Councils, or Bulls of Popes, which assert or establish such doctrines;—the advocates of the Church of Rome always asserting that no doctrine should be imputed to them which has not been formally determined by the authoritative formularies of the church.

This principle has justice in it. Whatever doctrine has not been asserted by a Church, ought not to be ascribed to that Church. It is an open question. But neither should any one claim for his Church any doctrine which she has not claimed for herself. An enemy ought not to impute, nor a friend claim for, a Church, any dogma which she has not avowed for herself.

Acting on this principle ; resolved to make no undue or unproved accusation, and prepared to reject any unfair or unproved claim ; I proposed that we should assert nothing of either Church without producing the authoritative Decrees and Bulls of the Church of Rome, or the authoritative Articles of the Church of England.

Such were the agreed terms of the discussion. The result is now before the world. And the Infallibility of the Church of Rome can no more, after this, be the defence or refuge of the advocates of that Church.

CHAPTER VIII.

CONVERSATION WITH THE PROFESSOR OF CANON LAW—THE FETE AT THE JESUITS' CHURCH, CLOSING THE YEAR—THE QUESTION OF INFALLIBILITY RESIDING IN A COUNCIL OR IN A POPE—SEVEN SIGNS OR TESTS BY WHICH TO DISCERN WHEN THE POPE IS INFALLIBLE AND WHEN FALLIBLE—THE ALLEGED UNSUITABLENESS OF THE SCRIPTURES AS A RULE OF FAITH—THE SAME ARGUMENT APPLIED TO THE PAPAL DECISIONS.

THE prospect of an elaborate conference with the reverend professor of Canon Law in the Collegio Romano, was one of considerable interest to me. It had been promised, that he should be informed of my anxiety for information as to the means or test by which I should be enabled to ascertain an infallible Bull from a fallible one—to know a Pope pronouncing infallibly from one pronouncing fallibly—to distinguish a decision ex cathedrā, from one non ex cathedrā. The point was one of no inconsiderable interest, and I felt no little pleasure in the anticipation of entering on it, with one who was so competent to deal with it—one who, from his learning, could state all that could best be offered on the question, and at the same time one, who from his position in the college, would add a certain authority to his statements. This professor was a Jesuit, one of the ablest and most accomplished of his order, and certainly one of the most elegant and most accomplished at Rome. I should have felt somewhat nervous at the prospect of this conversation, were it not that I had already had the good fortune of making his agreeable acquaintance ; and that the point to be considered, was one in which all the difficulties of the argument would necessarily be on his side.

The professor came on the appointed day, accompanied as usual by a lay-brother, and dressed in all the peculiar costume of the order of the Jesuits.

Our conversation commenced, by my thanking him for his kindness, in having made such gratifying arrangements to enable my wife and myself and one of our friends, to witness the fête at the church of Gesu, which belongs to the order. It was a fête celebrated on the last day of the year. His Holiness the Pope had arranged to attend and to sing the Te Deum, as an act of public thanksgiving, on the part of the Head of the Church on earth, for the blessings and mercies of the year that was then passing away for ever. He attended in state. He was accompanied by the Cardinals. The Swiss guards were arranged to preserve order. The congregation, which was chiefly English, was large. We were conducted by one of the Order, through a passage within the wall of the Church, by which we entered a small apartment, and were then led through a series of chambers, apparently those of a convent, till we were placed in a small gallery, in the best possible position for observing all, while we were ourselves beyond the observation of any. As seen from this position, nothing could surpass the picturesque beauty of the spectacle, especially at the moment of the elevation of the Host. The choir or chancel, with the High Altar, was splendidly illuminated. The High Priest, and his assistants, were before the altar in their most magnificent robes. Twelve youths from the College of the Propaganda Fide, formed two lines connecting the corners or horns of the altar with the rails of the chancel. They were clothed entirely from head to foot in scarlet, and held gigantic candles of wax in their hands. Those candles were about five feet long, and not less than five or six inches in circumference: and as the priest proceeded with the prayer of consecration, they all knelt still and motionless as marble statues; and as the priest elevated the Host they all gracefully drooped their heads, and slowly leaned forward their kneeling bodies till they almost touched the ground, and bent their large candles all at the same instant, and with the most practised regularity, till every candle seemed to bow in unison like things of life, in devout adoration to the present and visible divinity. As the eye wandered at this moment, from our little gallery, whence we could view the whole space of the Church—as it ranged from the splendid illumination of the High Altar, and rested on the officiating priest in robes of white silk, damasked with the richest foliage of gold, and then fell upon the twelve youths in scarlet, bowing gracefully to the earth with their gigantic candles, and then fell upon the aged Pontiff, the alleged Vicar of Christ, and anointed Head of the Church on earth, and then looked on the long array of Cardinals, those anointed princes of the Church, robed entirely in scarlet, and then strayed along the congregation, of which the ladies were clothed in black and veiled, and the men were mostly in the same colour, while the Swiss guards were arranged among them, relieving the mass of black costume, with the brilliant scarlet and yellow of their peculiar and antique uniform—as our eyes wandered over all this scene in this magnificent and noble Church, with its antique marbles and costly decorations, and its vaulted roof was filled with the sweetest and most beauteous music, we felt that we had never witnessed anything at Rome, in the way of a religious fête, so perfect in its arrangements, so picturesque in its appearance, and in such good taste and perfect keeping in all its accompaniments. It was the perfection of a religious spectacle, and exhibited the good taste and the worldly wisdom of the order of the Jesuits.

We had great reason to thank some members of the order for their arrangements in our favour. The only persons similarly favoured on this occasion, were an Italian princess and her companion, who alone shared with us the privacy and the advantage of this little gallery. Whatever were their motives for this kindness—and in truth they were scarcely concealed, seeing that the Cardinal Vicar had offered a mass with the intention to move God to facilitate our conversion—it shewed a good disposition on their part, and gave to us on this, as on some other occasions, increased facilities for observation. We thanked the professor, as the courtesy and kindness of some of his friends of the order deserved at our hands.

My wife expressed her thanks in better terms than I could command, at the same time giving lively utterance to the gratification derived from the ceremony, as a beautiful spectacle; and saying that its beauty was such, and that there was so much of the picturesque in the coup d'œil, that if transferred to canvass, it would make a most attractive picture,—that there was exceeding beauty as well as solemnity in it.

He observed in return, that it certainly was a beautiful and most charming sight to any one, but that it was much more so to those, who like himself viewed the Pope and the assembled Cardinals, as the head and representatives of the Catholic Church—the whole Church of God, and who looked on the beautiful spectacle, as the act of the Church of Jesus Christ singing their Te Deum, in praise and thankfulness, for all the mercies and goodness they had received during the departing year.

We said that we could quite understand the feeling in which he had viewed it, and which he had so appropriately expressed—and that we fully appreciated that feeling, especially as we understood that such was the nature and object of the ceremonial, as designed by those who had taken part in the spectacle. However we might differ from him, as to the details of the ceremonial or ritual portion of the spectacle, we were sure to agree with him, as to the Christian duty and privilege of public thanksgiving for mercies received. If we could not agree with him in the details, we could certainly agree with him in the spirit of the act.

Our conversation then turned to my previous meeting with our mutual friend, the reverend Signor —. I stated that he had given me much useful and important information, of which previously I was not in possession;—that in reference to the worship of the Virgin Mary, he had stated matters of considerable interest—and that we had a long and deeply interesting conversation, on the all-important subject of infallibility—on the necessity for its existence, and on the place or seat of its existence ; and that, supposing infallibility to exist either in a council or in a pope, I was disposed to go with him in thinking, that if it existed in either, the weight of argument seemed to preponderate in favor of the Pope.

He was much pleased at this admission on my part, and expressed himself as if he had understood me to state absolutely, my belief in the existence of infallibility in the Pope. He said I had admitted, that the preponderance of argument was with that opinion.

I reminded him that my observations were only on the supposition, that such infallibility did really exist in either a council or a pope ; but that the reverend Signor —— had by no means satisfied me, that it really existed in either the one or the other. Still I could freely say that, assuming it to exist in either a council or a pope, my judgment was in favour of the pope ; and my reason was, that all parties on this particular point, were fond of adverting to the words of our Lord to Peter—“Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church, and the gates of Hell shall not prevail against it.” All those in the Church of Rome, who claimed infallibility for that Church, appeared to base it on these words, and on the words, “Feed my sheep,” and “Feed my lambs,” which seem spoken to Peter, and to have connection with Peter ; and therefore they appeared, to me to prove the infallibility of the popes, as successors of Peter, much more naturally than the infallibility of councils, which are not in any way connected with these words. I said that I could not adopt the Roman Catholic interpretation of the passage concerning the rock, because I thought that our Lord meant to convey that He built his Church on the fact, that he was the Son of God as confessed by Peter, and not on Peter at all ; but that, on the supposition of the Roman Catholic interpretation being correct, namely, that the words referred to Peter, I thought that if the words involved infallibility, they involved the infallibility of Peter, and his successors the popes, rather than the infallibility of councils.

The professor, as a member of the order of Jesuits—for that order hold universally at Rome, the very loftiest claims and pretensions to infallibility, on the part of the popes, as contradistinguished from those who hold that the infallibility belongs to the general councils—shewed evident pleasure at my statement, and he appeared by his sparkling eye and joyous look, to think that if I was not already a proselyte to his Church, I was at least in a fair way for such a result, and that it remained for him to conduct me to the final goal. He expressed himself as greatly gratified with my views upon the subject, and with the conclusion at which I had arrived.

I said that the difficulty between the reverend Signor — and myself, arose from his pressing me much to join the Church of Rome, to abandon the Church of England, and to fling aside all my difficulties and objections, whether of mind or feeling, against the Church of Rome—to fling them all aside, and no longer doubting, debating or arguing, to throw them on the responsibility of the infallible tribunal, which had infallibly decided them. I added that in reply to this request on the part of our friend, I had asked him whether he could tell me, supposing infallibility to reside in the pope, how I could be enabled to judge with infallible certainty, when the pope decided ex cathedra, and when he decided non ex cathedrâ—when he was infallible and when fallible. I said that this was necessary, inasmuch as different popes had issued different and opposing bulls—that our mutual friend, the reverend Signor — had expressed himself as unable to explain the matter fully, and had promised that the professor himself should explain it to me.

He replied that the pope was infallible—that it belonged to him as the successor of St. Peter, to be the head of that Church, which was to be so founded and protected, that the gates of Hell should never prevail against it—that our Lord's promise in these words secured that this Church should be infallible—that this favoured and privileged Church, was the Holy and Catholic Church of Rome, whose first bishop was St. Peter, and whose successive bishops, as the successors of St. Peter, were the infallible interpreters and expounders of her doctrines, the vicars of Christ, and the infallible heads of the Church.

I said in reply to a great deal that fell from the professor upon this point, that the question at issue between the reverend Signor — and myself, was not whether the popes were infallible, but how and by what means I could discern a fallible decision from an infallible one. I reminded the professor, that he was of course aware that the popes were not always safe guides ;—that pope Liberius had avowed Arianism, and that pope Honorius was a Monothelite, and that as popes were not exempt from the worst of heresies, as these two examples demonstrated, so the real difficulty was to find some certain test by which to know when a pope was fallible, and when he was infallible.

He answered in a tone and with a manner, that seemed, as I thought at the moment, to betray a shade of annoyance at my pointed allusion to Liberius and Honorius. He said however, that Liberius was acting under restraint, and that he was not a free agent when he avowed the heresy of the Arians, and that therefore such avowal was not to be regarded as his real opinion. He said also that Honorius was thought too mild and lax in not punishing the Monothelites, and that it was on account of this that he was called a Monothelite, and not on account of his holding their heresy. He concluded by saying, that if either of these popes had proceeded to decide anything ex cathedrā, the decision would then have been infallible.

I replied, that my reading of the histories of Liberius and Honorius compelled me to adopt a very different opinion as to the orthodoxy of these popes—that I was fully convinced that one of them was really an Arian, and that the other was as really a Monothelite—that I was aware that the order of Jesuits, as the supporters of papal infallibility, had advanced the statements which the professor had just expressed, in order to save, if possible, the infallibility of these two popes, but that I felt that they had failed ; as all history was clearly against them. However, I continued, your own view shews that they acted and gave their decisions under undue restraint, or under a misplaced lenity ; and therefore your own view shews, that the popes are not at all times, and under all circumstances, infallible.

This the professor hesitated to acknowledge. It was more in his manner than in his matter. He merely said that when the Pope uttered his decision ex cathedrā, there could be no doubt of the infallibility of the decision. This at once conducted our conversation to the precise point, which I felt most anxious to open, and I saw that there could be no difficulty in entering on it, but I desired much to do so without any appearance of a controversial spirit on my part. I was anxious to stand in his eyes as one looking for information and open to conviction, rather than as one disposed to controvert and impugn his statements; and I was really most desirous of learning the very point now before us, as I had never yet been able to find anything on the subject, in the writings of any divines of any Church. It was a subject altogether new to me, and I feared that any preliminary conversation might awaken suspicions or doubts in his mind, which might prevent him being as communicative as my object required; and now, as on many another occasion during these conferences, I felt fully the necessity of turning in secret prayer to Him, whom I desired to serve, that he might give me the power to restrain my naturally controversial temper, and the wisdom and the spirit to speak as became me. I felt nervous and diffident of myself, perhaps more than I ought, when I found myself under circumstances which prevented my speaking as plainly and as strongly as I otherwise might, lest I should appear as a controversialist, rather than as an enquirer; and especially when I felt myself in the presence of men whom I had learned to regard, whether rightly or wrongly, as the most able, the most learned, and most subtle controversialists of the Church of Rome. The result did not always justify my fears, but those fears led me to look more frequently for the guidance and the wisdom of Him, "from whom cometh down every good and every perfect gift."

I said, that supposing the pope to be infallible whenever he uttered a decision or issued a bull ex cathedrā, it was still necessary to know how we were to ascertain a decision ex cathedrā, from a decision non ex cathedrā,—how, amidst the volumes of opposite and conflicting bulls of different popes, we were to know an infallible bull from a fallible one; or, as persons in England usually express it, how are we to ascertain when a pope is infallible, and when he is fallible.

He at once met the difficulty, and said that it was of very easy solution. He stated that there were certain requisites, certain essentials, which were characteristic of a bull ex cathedrā, and without which it could not be received as ex cathedrā, and that these characteristics were very easily ascertained. He added, that these requisites or essentials were seven in number, and that he feared to weary me by their detail, but that otherwise he should be happy to enter on them.

I did not fail to express with all fitting courtesy, my wishes that he would continue so interesting a detail, and I expressed the obligations I should feel for such valuable information, especially as, coming from one holding his important position at Rome, it could not but possess much of authority in my eyes; and would be sure to possess the same in the eyes of others.

He then proceeded to state, that there was no real difficulty in ascertaining, when and under what circumstances the decision of the pope was to be received as infallible: that there were certain requisites or essentials; and that the presence or absence of these would be an adequate test by which to ascertain the point: that these requisites or essentials were seven in number, and were all very clear and very easy to be recognized. He then described them in detail.

I. It was necessary in the first place, that before composing and issuing the bull, the pope should have opened a communication with the bishops of the universal Church—that in such communication he should ask their prayers to the Almighty, that the Holy Spirit might fully and infallibly guide him, so as to make his decision, the decision of inspiration. He added that by thus previously asking the prayers of the bishops, he would obtain the prayers of the universal Church for Divine assistance, before he proceeded to form or publish his decision.

I asked him how, seeing that there was a necessity for this previous communication on the part of the pope with the bishops—how I was to inform myself, that this requisite or essential had really been borne in mind. He merely replied, that it was very easy to be ascertained, and then proceeded to the second particular.

II. It was necessary in the second place, that before issuing the bull containing his decision, the pope should carefully seek all possible and desirable information, touching the special matter which was under consideration, and which was to be the subject of his decision. And that he should be specially careful to possess himself of all available information from those persons, who were residing in the district affected by the opinion called in question, and who were found faithful in that district; that so the pope might have all the requisite information for an infallible decision, from the very district in which the opinion, on which the decision was sought, had its origin or its existence.

I asked in reference to this—how I was to be assured that the pope was thus rightly and fully informed—that he had sought and obtained the required information, and was thus capacitated for proceeding to issue the bull? He replied as before, that there was not the least difficulty in ascertaining this, and so passed on to the third particular.

III. He said that a further requisite or essential was, that the bull should not only be formal, but should be authoritative, and should claim to be authoritative: that it should be issued not merely as the opinion or judgment of the pope, in his mere personal capacity, but as the decisive and authoritative judgment of one, who was the Head of that Church, which was the mother and mistress of all Churches, to whom all Christians owed subjection and allegiance, and who was the living voice of infallibility, and who as such, had the power and the authority, to pronounce infallibly the decision required.

I remarked, that this requisite could be easily ascertained, as it must necessarily appear on the face of the bull, the only difficulty being, to obtain a true copy of the bull. He then stated the fourth particular.

IV. It was again necessary, that the bull should be promulgated universally; that is, that the bull should be addressed to all the bishops of the universal church, in order that through them its decision might be delivered and made known to all the members or subjects of the whole Church. The pope was the fountain-head of all episcopal jurisdiction, so as that there can be no episcopal jurisdiction but from the pope; and as episcopacy is the only channel through which every grace flows to the Church, so it is necessary that the bull, containing the decision of the pope, be addressed to all the bishops of the universal Church.

I observed on this point, that the superscription or title of the bull, would at once show whether this essential was forthcoming ; and I begged the reverend professor to proceed. He then passed on to the fifth requisite.

V. He stated that another essential was, that the bull should be universally received ; that is, should be accepted by all the bishops of the whole Church, and accepted by them as an authoritative and infallible decision—that, after promulgation by the pope, it should be accepted and promulgated by all the bishops as authoritative and infallible, or at least should be simply accepted by them without formal promulgation, or even tacitly permitted by them without opposition, which is held to be a sufficient acceptance in a legal sense.

I said that this was a point very difficult to be ascertained. I knew not of anything more difficult to ascertain with satisfaction, than whether any given bull was received and promulgated, or simply received without promulgation, or only permitted without opposition in any given country. Some are received in Spain, which are rejected in France ; and some are received in France, which are rejected in England and Ireland ; and some are rejected in all these, and yet are said to be accepted in Italy ; and the assertions made on all sides upon this fact were so contradictory, that I knew nothing so difficult to be ascertained to satisfaction. It opens out a prodigious sphere of inquiry and disputation. He smiled, and assured me there was not the least difficulty, and went on to the sixth particular.

VI. Another characteristic, he said, was of immense importance, indeed more absolutely essential than any he had as yet named, viz. The matter or question, upon which the decision was to be made, and which was therefore to be the subject-matter of the bull, must be one touching faith or morals ; that is, it must concern the purity of faith, or the morality of actions. And this necessity arose from the fact, that faith and morality are the matters upon which infallibility was designed to be exercised, and for the preservation of which this infallibility was given to the Head of the Church.

I remarked that this was very reasonable, and that I fully acquiesced in it ; but that an opinion prevailed very generally in England, that the Church of Rome had strained “ faith ” and “ morality,” to include all matters of fact, even matters of history, whenever they seemed to bear upon any question of “ faith ” or “ morality ;”—that this was practically illustrated in the celebrated controversy between the Jesuits and the Jansenists, where the point at issue was the mere matter of fact, whether the opinions condemned by both parties, were really contained in a specified book. I said that a difficulty might arise in prosecuting our enquiries, as to whether this essential was there. He seemed a little annoyed at this allusion, so I begged he would be so kind as to proceed to the seventh particular.

VII. This was the last of the series. He said it was essential in the last place, that the pope should be free—perfectly free from all exterior influence, so as to be under no exterior compulsion or constraint. He stated that the bull or decision of pope Liberius possessed the other essentials, but that this one was wanting. That pope had acted under compulsion—under a fear of his life, and therefore as he was not free, his decision could not be regarded as ex cathedrā. That bull, thus issued, was full of error. The pope therefore must be free from external influence or constraint, in order to his decision being received as infallible.

On this I remarked quietly, that it would be very difficult for me or for any one in England, to ascertain with anything like moral certainty, whether the pope at the issuing of any bull was really under exterior influence, or whether he was perfectly free. I did not see how it was possible to have certainty on such a point. He said as before, that there was no real difficulty in this or in any of the tests he had specified, and merely added that these several essentials or requisites, were the tests by which any bull was to be tried. If they existed, then the bull was ex cathedrā, and was to be received as infallible ; but if any of them were wanting, then the bull was not ex cathedrā, and could not be recognised otherwise than as fallible..

I felt exceedingly interested in all this detail. It was the first time I had ever heard of any means by which to test the existence of infallibility.

Hitherto various bulls and decrees had frequently been cited, and often one was asserted to be infallible and authoritative, and another fallible and rejected. One pope with his decisions were urged on one side, and another pope with his bulls were cited on the opposite ; and between conflicting bulls and opposite decisions, and one bull rescinding a former one, and one decision reversing a preceding one ; and amidst all this conflict and confusion, I had never seen or read or heard of any means, by which I could learn when a pope was fallible and when he was infallible. I therefore felt considerably interested in the details of the reverend professor of Canon Law, and thanked him warmly for the information he had imparted to me. I asked however several questions, anxiously avoiding the appearance of unnecessary cavilling or captiousness, and putting them with the manner of one who rather sought further information. My questions referred to the difficulty which persons like myself, resident in England, would experience before they could ascertain whether the pope had asked for the prayers of the universal Church—whether he had sought and obtained the requisite information—whether his bull was really received and promulgated universally, &c. ; and I suggested that it was quite possible that other persons in England, simple and unlearned men, unacquainted with such subjects, and wholly unable to obtain information on them, might feel these enquiries not only difficult but absolutely impossible, and in any case altogether uncertain and unsatisfactory. I suggested also yet further, that if there was difficulty in ascertaining all these minute particulars, in reference to any bull that might be issued at the present day, the difficulty must be enhanced a thousand-fold, when the enquiry concerned some bull that had been issued some centuries ago. It becomes not only a moral but even an absolute impossibility, for ordinary men to carry out the enquiry to any satisfactory result.

He replied, that all that was necessary for any man in such cases was, to go to his bishop—ask the bishop respecting the bull in question—and the bishop would inform him whether it was ex cathedrā or otherwise. Nothing could be easier.

I said that though certainly nothing could be easier than such a course, yet that I apprehended that nothing could be more unsatisfactory to an English mind. It proposed to leave the whole question of the fallibility or infallibility of any given decision to the word of a bishop, who was himself fallible and might be mistaken, both as to the fact and as to the meaning of the bull. It was not usual in England --it did not suit the character of the English mind, to refer the decision of such historical facts as the pope's freedom from influence --the reception of his bulls, &c., to the mere opinion of a bishop. Men there would be very apt to think themselves quite as good judges as to the matter of fact.

He said that the bishop was the legitimate channel for all communications from the pope, as the Head of the Church and Vicar of Christ ; and all doubts would at once be removed from the minds of humble and sincere men, if they referred it to the bishop.

I replied that it would suggest itself to most minds, that such a course was merely placing all their faith and hope of salvation on the word of a bishop, a man like themselves, and admitted to be fallible. And I added, that from my knowledge of the English mind and habit of thinking, men in England—men of common sense and ordinary judgment, in most things would prefer turning to the Holy Scriptures, and judging for themselves. It would be a most difficult thing to alter their habit in this particular. They would prefer comparing the bull with the Holy Scriptures, and thus learning, not the opinion of the bishop, who was but a man, but the judgment of God in his own word, for so they habitually regarded the Holy Scriptures.

He laughed at me for this, and said that an appeal to the Scriptures was absurd and impossible. It might all be very well comparatively for men like himself and me, who were well read and well versed in sacred literature ; but it was quite otherwise with men in general, and especially with humble and illiterate or ignorant men ; in fact with the great mass of mankind. For,—he argued with a tone of great confidence, his whole face lighted up with the expression of conscious triumph,—the Holy Scriptures are a volume that requires many preliminary enquiries before it can be received. In the first place, it will be necessary for the man to ascertain the authenticity of every separate book, or portion of the volume. In the next place, it will be necessary for him to prove the Divine inspiration of every part of it. In the third place, the book is written in dead languages, and the man must know how to understand them or have them translated. In the fourth place, it is a volume that has given rise to different meanings or interpretations, and the man should be able to judge upon these. All these he argued, are preliminary enquiries, which are absolutely necessary to be made ; and as the poor and ignorant man, the ordinary man, is incapable of making them and judging on them, so the Holy Scriptures can never be a fitting volume for such a man to appeal to in matters of religion.

At this point of our conversation, where he seemed most confident and apparently conscious of a triumph over me, as if he thought no answer could be returned to his argument, I felt that he had given me a prodigious advantage, of which he was wholly unaware. It was the very position in which I had wished to place him, and I could not have led him into a line of argument more suited to my purpose. I felt in my soul, that the Lord had delivered him into my hands, and could not but render my thanksgiving in secret to Him, who gave me the opportunity of dealing effectually with this matter ; and I inwardly prayed that I might be cool and collected, and effective in my reply. I hoped most fervently, that it might have some effect upon his mind.

I began by stating, that while my own opinion on the point was a matter of unimportance, yet I apprehended his method of argument would be met in England in a very effective way, at least in such a way as I should be unable to answer, unless he informed me further than he had as yet done. I said that the most ordinary and common-place men in England would say, that if they forsook the volume of the Holy Scriptures, for the volume of the papal bulls—that if they exchanged the Bible for the Bullarium, they could gain no advantage thereby ; for if, as he had said, there was a necessity for a man to ascertain the authenticity of each book in the Holy Scriptures, before he could avail himself of it, then it was no less true that it was equally necessary for a man to ascertain the much-questioned authenticity of each bull in the Bullarium—that if, as he had alleged, the man must be carefully informed by study, on the inspiration of the sacred volume, before receiving it as his Divine teacher, there will exist a similar necessity for his being informed by study on the disputed infallibility of the papal Bullarium, before receiving it as his infallible instructor ;—that if, as he had averred, the Holy Scriptures were written in the dead languages, and a man must learn to translate them before using them, the very same may be averred against the papal bulls, which also are all written in a dead language, and a man must learn to translate them before appealing to them ;—that if, as he had argued, the Holy Scriptures have been variously interpreted by various men, and all this variety must be resolved by every man before he makes the sacred volume his guide, it might in like manner be argued that the papal bulls have been variously explained, some received and some rejected by a vast variety of persons, and men must be able to decide on all these varying interpretations of bulls, before accepting them as an infallible guide—in short it would be argued,—fairly argued, by men of no pretension to anything but the possession of common sense, that every objection he urged against the volume of the Holy Scripture, was liable to be urged against the volume of the papal bulls. They were written in a dead language. They were the subject of various interpretations. They were the source of endless controversies. Their number and names were doubtful. Their title to infallibility was questioned. All men disputed as to which was fallible and which infallible. Some bulls were directly contradictory of others ; some actually and by name were condemnatory of others ; some were admitted on all hands to be erroneous and heretical ; and the whole combined, constituted a series of volumes, almost as extended as a library, and therefore wholly inaccessible to the masses of a Christian population. They could never become the guide of a Christian people, and to this day have never yet been translated into the language of any Christian Church. While the Holy Scriptures on the other hand were universally translated, were small in size, convenient for reference, and incomparably more easy to be read, studied and understood, than the endless intricacies and scholastic niceties of the Bullarium. I said that men in England would argue thus, and would feel that they should lose rather than gain by exchanging their Bible for the Bullarium—the Holy Scriptures for the papal bulls.

I perceived that the countenance of the reverend professor was undergoing a change. It betrayed impatience and irritation. He looked rather angrily upon me ; but I was resolved to persevere, though in terms and in manner as kindly as possible, speaking as if I was stating the probable objections of others rather than my own. I transferred the argument from myself to others, and expressed myself as enquiring how I should be able to answer such objections if advanced by others.

I therefore suggested that his argument on the subject of the papal Bulls—that his seven requisites or essentials by which a bull is to be tested before it is recognised as ex cathedrā or infallible, seemed liable to the objection, that few—very few men indeed could possibly ascertain the existence of these tests. With all the learning of the reverend professor himself, and with what little reading I possessed myself, I yet feared that insuperable difficulties would lie in our way ; and how much more fairly might a simple mechanic or peasant in England object that he knew nothing, and could know nothing, about the Bullarium, with its twenty or thirty folio volumes of scholastic matter in the Latin language—that he could never ascertain whether these seven requisites or essentials were present or absent—that it would be impossible for him to learn satisfactorily, whether pope Boniface, or pope Hildebrand, or pope Gregory, before issuing any Bull, had sought the prayers of the universal Church—that it would be hopeless for him to attempt to ascertain whether they had sought and obtained all necessary information, in the districts supposed to be most affected by the question under consideration—that no effort that could be made could assure him of the universal acceptance or promulgation of the bull, on the part of all the bishops of the universal Church. Thus an unlettered man in England, might fairly argue that, if it were necessary to enter on all these enquiries, cumbrous, difficult, and impossible as they were, before he could be assured of the legality and infallibility of each bull, there could then be no possibility of his getting even one step towards infallibility ; and such a man seemed to me able to object with much force, that if he was asked to abandon his Protestant principles, and to embrace Roman views—to exchange his faith in the Holy Scriptures for a faith in the papal bulls—to build his confidence and hope no longer on the inspiration of the Bible, but on the infallibility of the Bullarium—that it was only involving himself in a series of questions which he could never solve, and encumbering himself unnecessarily with all the difficulties of these seven tests,—all the subtleties involved in the question of infallibility—all the disputes as to whether that infallibility existed in the popes or in the councils ; in short in a most cumbrous and difficult system : when, remaining in the principles of Protestantism, he had the Bible—the word of God—in his hands, a volume of easy access, a volume with whose language he was familiar from childhood, a volume that required practically no extent of human learning to understand for all practical purposes in this life —in short, a facile and convenient rule of life and faith, which, as being inspired of God was necessarily infallible. I suggested that any simple and unlettered man in England might so argue, and the argument seemed to me to involve a powerful objection ; one that required an answer ; and I asked the professor whether he could supply me with such an answer.

The whole manner of my reverend friend exhibited his sense of the difficulty. He seemed to me to feel that his argument recoiled on himself; not having perceived that, while he had imagined his seven tests were overpowering my scruples, they were really so many stumbling-blocks in the way. It had not, I must confess, a favorable influence on his manner, as he seemed to feel irritation at being foiled, rather than disposed to give the argument due weight in his own mind. Nor would I have pressed it so far, only that I felt it my duty to lay the difficulty fairly and fully before him, that it might, by that influence which is not the less potent because it is unseen, work its own way in his mind, when time and opportunity might afford it further consideration.

He only said in reply, that he thought all these difficulties would be removed by referring to the bishop, whose decision should be final. He would at once say, which bulls were fallible and which infallible, or rather which were ex cathedrā, and which non ex cathedrā. It appertained to the office of the bishop to do so.

I said it might, and very probably would, be objected by some minds to this, that the bishops of France gave an answer different from the bishops of Italy on these bulls ; that on one side of the Alps certain bulls are pronounced infallible, which at the other side of the same Alps are held to be fallible ; and therefore that a reference to the bishop, could not be sufficient to satisfy some thinking men ; at least I could not answer for the people of Italy, but certainly such a system could never satisfy the thinking and judging people of England. They habitually enquired and judged for themselves, and never would leave such a matter of fact to the decision of the bishop.

He argued, that I ought not to refer to the difference of the French and Italian bishops, on the subject of infallibility—that it was a very favorite system of arguing among the English writers, but that it was really of no importance ; for the Church was one—was at unity, and that I should find that the religion of France was identical with the religion of Italy, so that however differing on the point of infallibility, they were one and united on everything else.

I said that I apprehended we could not agree on that point, as I thought there were other particulars on which the difference was equally marked.

Our conversation soon took another turn. I felt that enough had been said by me, and that the subject—the special subject of our conference, was sufficiently opened. I therefore allowed him to lead away to other and more general topics. As my wife was almost always present, there was great facility for this whenever it was desirable. We were all soon conversing on a variety of points connected with the external aspect and form of religion at Rome ; and the professor and we parted, with expressions of mutual gratification in forming an acquaintance, which promised to be profitable and improving, as connected with our eternal interests.

NOTE ON THE CONVERSATION WITH THE PROFESSOR OF CANON LAW.

The principal point in the foregoing conversation, next to the details of the seven essentials said to characterize an infallible bull, is the evidence by which a man, ordinarily circumstanced, may be able to ascertain the existence or non-existence,—the presence or absence of all these in the case of any particular bull.

The Professor of Canon Law stated, that in case of any doubt, an application was to be made to the Bishop, whose answer was to determine the enquiry. My reply was, that this made all uncertain, for it made all depend on the word of the Bishop, who was but a man, and a fallible one.

My opponents in England have communicated with the reverend Professor at Rome on this subject; and the following strictures, neither confuting nor denying my narrative, have been the result. With what object they have been made public, I am unable to understand. They state—

“ In one of his chapters Mr. Seymour has endeavoured to shew that, by Father Mazio’s admission, Catholics are the most unfortunate people in the world, in having no satisfactory means of ascertaining even what their own Church teaches! He passes before our eyes a phantasmagoria, in which bulls, decrees, Popes, Bishops, canon law, and we know not what besides, are mingled together in bewildering confusion, till our eyes and thoughts are dazzled, and we feel something like the astonishment of a clown, who should have it proved to him by the irre-

fragable logic of a philosopher, that he himself did not exist at all. If any of our readers have had perseverance to read through Mr. Seymour's mystification, they will perhaps be glad to be refreshed by Father Mazio's commentary. What Mr. Seymour says (he remarks) about the reception of papal bulls, in which all countries do not agree together, is only true in regard to matters of discipline. There is no dogmatic bull of the Popes which is not received and accepted by the universal Church. We may say the same of the Council of Trent, whose decrees in matters of discipline are not de facto received in England and in some other countries, but whose canons in matters of faith are a necessary standard of doctrine and belief for all Catholics in every country.

“Conflicting bulls and opposite decisions of the Popes may be found in matters of discipline, not of faith. Discipline is frequently changing in a great many points, according to the variations of times and places; but faith must be, and has always been, one and the same in the Catholic Church.

“The twenty, and more, volumes in folio of the Bullarium contain for far the most part laws on ecclesiastical discipline. The dogmatic bulls of the Popes are very few in number. There is no need for Catholic believers to apply either to the Bullarium, or to the Collection of Councils, to ascertain what they are to believe. What is universally taught in the Catechism of the Church is sufficient for general believers, provided they believe all the remaining truths implicitly, submitting to every thing defined, or to be defined, by the authority of the Church.

“The testimony and the fact of each Bishop's receiving a papal bull as a dogmatic bull ex cathedra, is the clearest and firmest evidence to people at large that the bull is so. This consent of the episcopacy, of the teaching body with their head, can be very easily ascertained. The bull Unigenitus, and the bull Auctorem Fidei, are instances of it. Surely the party which is condemned will oppose, will contrive every way of eluding the dogmatic decree passed against them, as the Jansenists did; but the voice of Catholic episcopacy will ever come forth to pay homage and support to the papal decision. We may take, as a new instance, the dogmatic subject of the Immaculate Conception. Would it be a matter of doubt to any one, that the Catholic episcopate has been applied to by the Pope for advice; that solemn prayers have been offered every where; that the Bishops have expressed to the Pope their opinion on the subject? And if a decree on this subject, at its coming out, were announced and received in every country by all Catholic Bishops, or even by the far greatest part of them, could any Catholic entertain a doubt as to its being ex cathedra? Mr. Seymour takes delight in heaping up difficulties and perplexities where there are none, or they are very easy to overcome; and cares not for all the invincible difficulties and perplexities which beset the rule of faith which Protestants follow. Moreover, he did not express his Protestant sentiments so strongly and so fully in his conversations, but, by his reserve, or deceit, prevented Father Mazio from giving him those further explanations and answers which he would have given if he had expressed himself as he has in his book."

It is here admitted that there are "conflicting bulls." The admission is important, and involves all my argument requires, as shewing the necessity for some test by which to determine between them. For even though it were true, as is here stated most incorrectly, that all these "conflicting bulls" have reference to discipline and not to doctrine, yet there must be some test by which to decide between them.

The Professor of Canon Law at Rome stated, that there were seven essentials, as specified in my narrative, the presence or absence of which served as a test to distinguish the bull ex cathedra from the non ex cathedra—the infallible from the fallible. He added, that in case a doubt was raised as to the matter of fact, namely, as to the presence or absence of any one of these tests, it was to be determined by the word of the Bishop. This position, extraordinary as it may seem to thoughtful men, is not only not denied or rejected, but is reiterated by the reviewers. They state—

“ The testimony and the fact of each Bishop receiving a papal bull as a dogmatic bull, ex cathedra, is THE CLEAREST AND FIRMEST EVIDENCE to people at large that the bull is so.”

Thus when the enquiry is, whether any specified bull is fallible or infallible, it is to be determined by the presence or absence of certain tests. And when the enquiry as to the matter of fact, whether those tests are present or absent, it is to be decided by the Bishop. And thus on a question which is a mere matter of fact, and not a point of doctrine, the word of the Bishop is stated to be “ the clearest and firmest evidence.” It used to be said that even the infallibility of the Pope himself did not extend to matters of fact, but only to questions of doctrine, but here it is said that the word of the Bishop is “ the clearest and firmest evidence” of those matters of fact which are to be taken as the tests whether a bull be fallible or infallible !

But strange as is all this, it is not half so strange as what follows ; for the reviewers afterwards intimate that this “ clearest and firmest evidence” is no clear or firm evidence at all. They state—

“ If a decree at its coming out were announced and received in every country by all Catholic Bishops, or even by the far greatest part of them, could any Catholic entertain a doubt as to its being ex cathedra ? ”

It is here admitted that the assent of all the Bishops is not necessary—that the assent of a large majority is sufficient—that the refusal of a minority does not taint the infallibility of the bull. This at once dashes all certainty to the earth ; for, in the first place, a thoughtful man, believing that infallibility is determined by the majority, may very naturally raise a doubt as to whether and how the votes of all the Bishops in the world have been taken and scrutinized, so as to make it certain on which side the real, not fictitious, majority would be found. And, in the second place, the man who lives under some refusing or non-assenting Bishop, is referred to one who will inform him that the bull is a fallible one. And thus a man's belief as to the fallibility or infallibility of any bull, being dependent on the word of the Bishop under whom he lives, must vary with each varying diocese. It is fallible in one: it is infallible in the other.

It is not easy to conceive the object of the reviewers in thus placing this subject in a light far more objectionable than anything contained in my narration of this conversation. And certainly they have not improved their position by alluding to the dogmatic bull lately issued, respecting "the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary;" for as the seventh essential is the full and perfect freedom of the Pope from external and personal constraint, it may reasonably be questioned whether it is found in the case of a bull issued, as this was, at a time when he was under such personal constraint as to be compelled to fly from Rome in disguise; and when he was under such external constraint, that he was unable to reside with safety even within the borders of the Roman See.

CHAPTER IX.

OPINIONS ENTERTAINED AT ROME RESPECTING THE MOVEMENT IN THE ANGLICAN CHURCH—THE BISHOP OF EXETER AND OTHERS AT OXFORD—CAUTION AGAINST ROMANS INTERMEDDLING WITH THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND—SEPARATION OF THE TEMPORAL FROM THE SPIRITUAL POWER OF THE POPES—ARGUMENT DERIVED FROM THE SUCCESS OF THE MISSIONS OF THE CHURCH OF ROME—AN INDIAN TRIBE CONVERTED—THEIR HOLY LIVES—WONDERFUL MIRACLE—CREDULITY PREVALENT AT ROME—INCONSISTENCY BETWEEN TWO DOCTRINES OF THAT CHURCH—TRANSUBSTANTIATION AND THE MASS—THE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION—HUMAN MERIT—INDULGENCES.

THE movement among certain gentlemen at Oxford furnished a frequent subject of conversation among my reverend friends of the order of Jesus. It was evidently a source of the largest anticipation, and there were moments when nothing seemed too extravagant in the way of hope as a result from it. It was generally looked on as the beginning of the conversion of England, and many an eye brightened, and many a cheek flushed, in triumphant expectation of her return to the arms of Rome. The remarkable letter or rescript of the Cardinal-Viear, appointing a novena, that is, a nine days' service, and promising a PLenary INDULGENCE, that is, a complete exemption from purgatory and immediate admission into paradise after death, to all who took part in this Novena, praying for the extirpation of heresy, the exaltation of the Church, and the conversion of England to the Church of Rome ;—this remarkable document had not yet been issued, but hopes were high, conversations were frequent, and confidence was unbounded on the subject ; and masses were offered for the conversion of individuals, for whom a peculiar interest was felt.

The volume by Mr. Ward on the ideal of a Church, which had been published in England a short time before, had found entrance into Rome. It was sent to me by one of my reverend friends of the Collegio Romano ; and when he came shortly afterwards, his mind seemed full of the subject of the Anglican Church—its present state and its future destinies. We were not likely to agree on such a subject. As usual, his companion remained silent, and took no part in the conversation.

He expressed himself in strong terms against the Anglican bishops, for having set themselves against the principles and practices proposed to be introduced by the gentlemen at Oxford. He stated that they had shewn their opposition, and although he regarded their opposition as likely to fail in the end, yet they had sufficiently shewn their feeling, and proved that nothing was to be expected from them. He selected, however, and excepted the bishop of Exeter, and it seemed as if no language of hatred and scorn combined, could be too strong to express his feelings respecting him. He said in a rather exaggerating way, that the main body of the most learned and influential of the heads of houses, professors, and tutors at Oxford, were sufficiently well disposed to a union with Rome—that the vast portion of the rural clergy were inclined to glide over in the same direction—that the great majority of the younger clergy, fresh from the university, were over-zealous in the matter, almost requiring restraint—that many of the aristocracy and gentry, educated at the universities, were prepared and wishing for the change; and that while all minds were thus directed to a great and grand object, one worthy of the thoughts of a whole people—while the mind of England, and England's Church, was forsaking the principles and ideas of centuries, and now turning to tradition and to the fathers—while the whole learning, and feeling, and desire, and hope of the clergy of the Anglican Church, was towards a return to the bosom of their Holy Mother the Church of Rome, and sighing for Catholic unity—this high and holy feeling, this onward and noble feeling, was marred and turned aside by the littleness of the bishop of Exeter. That bishop, he stated, had raised a question about black gowns and white surplices—a question of such paltry insignificance and contemptible littleness—and by evoking a host of enemies, and raising a hurricane of opposition, turned all minds from the right direction, from the grand subject, from the great object of true religion, and the right Church, and unity, and tradition, and all that was truly precious, and likely to effect a glorious work; and turned all minds to such anile trifling, as a dispute about gowns and surplices. He had promised much, and no doubt intended much; but by his littleness, and by his energy and talent in turning little things into great things, he had strengthened the hands of his opponents, and utterly marred for a time the very work in which he had himself been one of the most active and useful labourers. A noble work was thus provokingly marred by the imprudence and indiscretion of one of its partizans, and no language was too strong to apply to him. He dealt sharply too with the bishop of London.

All this, and much more of the same nature, fell from my reverend friend respecting the bishop of Exeter. He shewed considerable heat, which seemed to me to argue that the Jesuits at Rome were much annoyed and disappointed at seeing the turn that things were taking in England. It was not for me to undertake any defence of either the bishop of Exeter, or the bishop of London.

My friend soon turned to Mr. Newman and Dr. Pusey, and stated that he felt they were doing a glorious work, in impregnating the minds of the students of the university, and especially the younger clergy, with Catholic principles. It was a subject of unmixed thankfulness, that such doctrines should be so openly avowed and taught in the very university of the Anglican Church, after three centuries of suppression and silence ; and it was impossible that the movement—the impetus which it gave to the progress of Catholic truth, could fail to end in the final triumph of the Church of Rome. It might be checked or turned aside for a short time, but must soon return to its main channel, and move on irresistibly to its great destiny. It was impossible that Mr. Newman, Dr. Pusey, Mr. Ward and other leaders could remain where they were. They had gone so far that they must necessarily go farther, and when they entered the Church of Rome, they would be followed by the greater part of the Anglican Church. They could not honestly remain as they were.*

* At the time of this conversation, Mr. Ward and Mr. Newman had not openly joined the Church of Rome.

I said that I quite felt with him, that these persons could not honestly remain in the Church of England ; and that they were bound, holding the principles which they professed, to join the Church of Rome :—that if I myself held their principles, I should do so :—but that many persons felt a difficulty in justifying themselves to their own consciences, in leaving the Church of their own accord, without being compelled to do so by the authorities of the Church ; and it was possible some of these persons might be influenced to remain from this feeling.

He said that such a feeling was very excusable, where there was not a decided difference of opinion and principle on essentials ; but there was a line somewhere. As long as they kept within that line, they might indeed remain, but when once they had gone beyond it—when once they renounced or abandoned the essential principles of one Church, and adopted the essential principles of the other —then to remain was not consistent, not honest ; and this was the case of these persons. He said they had passed the line, and he should be greatly disappointed if any of them remained as they were. It would not be honest—or becoming the honesty of Christian men, to remain in the Church of England.

I gave my full assent to this, adding that I was sure he would not be disappointed, and that all these gentlemen would ultimately join the Church of Rome.

He then panegyrised in very glowing terms, the conduct and talent of Mr. Ward, and spoke in the most triumphant tone of the approaching fall of the Church of England—that it was an event for which God was to be thanked, especially as it seemed to be His doing ; as being a movement which sprang up spontaneously in the heart of the Anglican Church herself. It did not originate with Rome, though of course she watched it anxiously, and assisted it to the utmost of her power ; and, he added, smiling expressively,—she has power, and we shall soon see England with us again.

I said in return, that they would be wise to let England alone, and in no way to intermeddle with her State, or her Church. It might possibly lead to England's intermeddling with Rome.

He asked me what I meant.

I replied, that the people of England did not like to be interfered with, and might be disposed to resent it. I then said boldly to him, that I was fully aware that a large portion of the people of the Roman states were anxious to separate the ecclesiastical authority of the pope, from the civil sovereignty—that they desired to leave the Pope as the spiritual head of the Catholic Church ; but, as far as I could learn their sentiments, they were desirous to divest him of his temporal sovereignty—that they had expressed themselves in very many instances, speaking freely to me as a stranger and as an Englishman loving free institutions, as anxious that the Pope should be reduced simply to the state of a christian bishop, ruling the Church as such, but by no means ruling the state as a temporal sovereign—that this feeling seemed to me so general that all that was required was, that some bold man should lift the standard of revolution, and that the people would follow.

He smiled and asked how this, supposing it to be true, could affect the question as concerning the Anglican Church.

I answered, that if Rome interfered too much with the Church in England, perhaps England might interfere a little with the Church at Rome—that there was a powerful sentiment, an enthusiastic feeling for Protestantism, and an unhesitating hatred of Romanism, among a large portion of the people of England ; and if these persons were once roused, they might evoke public feeling—subscribe large funds—fluence the government—and encourage those Italians, and especially those Romans who desired to raise the standard of revolution at Rome, and thus separate the temporal from the spiritual power of the pope. It were wise therefore, not to intermeddle too much with the Church of England.

This elicited a display of irritation and anger for which I was scarcely prepared. I felt however that I was speaking on good authority ; as the feeling to which I referred was general among some of the most respectable of the citizens of Rome—that it was shared by some of the most influential persons, and by a very large portion of the tradesmen—that they all spoke with especial dislike and hatred of the order of Jesuits, saying, that as sure as any Jesuit was permitted to enter any house, there was as surely destined to follow in his wake a series of family disputes, so as that there could be no peace in any family into which they were admitted—that in consequence of this there was a growing feeling at Rome, against not only the order of Jesuits, but against the monks of every other order—that this feeling was extending itself rapidly against all ecclesiastical government, and especially against ecclesiastics holding government appointments, and conducting the temporal and civil affairs of the state,—that the whole body of the laity, excluded as they were from all important, influential and lucrative offices, were dissatisfied with such exclusion, and were predisposed to any revolution which, by excluding ecclesiastics, and confining them to spiritual matters, might lay open all the civil offices of the state to the fair and honourable ambition of the laity. Feeling all this, and knowing that my reverend friend must be well aware of it, I could not be much surprised, that he felt angered or irritated at the use which I made of it ; namely, as a warning to him and his friends among the Jesuits, not to interfere too much in the affairs of the Church or State of England.

I felt that a change in the subject of our conversation was desirable, as there was neither information nor profit to be derived from the political aspect of Rome, nor from the opinions entertained at Rome, respecting the state of the Church of England ; and therefore when he said in a tone of triumph, that the Church of England must soon fall utterly to ruin and pass away for ever, or unite herself to the Church of Rome, I was glad of the opportunity it afforded for changing the subject of conversation. It led to some statements among the most remarkable I had yet heard.

In arguing for the Church of Rome, and against the Church of England, he stated that Providence was every day setting the seal of testimony to the former, and withholding it from the latter. He said that this was peculiarly visible in the department of missions ; for that, while the missionary labors of the Church of England, notwithstanding the commanding influence and wealth of England, were without any success that deserved the name, the preaching of the missionaries of the Church of Rome had met with the most wonderful successes—that the multitudes of heathen, who were converted of late years, were beyond expression; and that from every quarter of the globe, the information received was of the same happy and triumphant character. The great God of Christianity was manifesting his advocacy of His own cause, by giving the most ample success to the missionary labours of His own Church; and this he continued, was an evidence and proof of His favor and love to the Church of Rome, which elevated her above the Church of England, and was so abundant that ere long the whole heathen world must bow to the truth and embrace the Church of Rome.

I replied that I had not much faith in the statements sometimes put forth on the subject of missions. I mentioned the narrative of a friend of my own, who was witness to the conversion of a whole tribe of American Indians. He told me the whole tribe marched down to a river, and that the Roman Catholic priest, without a word of instruction, sprinkled water on every one in the usual form; and that he then hung a little cross by a string around the neck of each, and telling them they were now Christians, he left them. My friend told me that the Indians departed precisely as they came—heard no preaching—received no instruction—exhibited no sign of Christianity—made no profession of any faith—but departed precisely as they came, as naked, as savage, as wild and as ignorant and heathen, with this only difference, that each had a little cross suspended around his neck! I added that I fully believed the statement of my informant, who would not deceive me, and that I did not see how the Church of Rome could triumph much in such alleged conversions.

His answer to this was very striking, as shewing a degree of credulity which I could never have anticipated.

He said that I was altogether mistaken, in doubting the reality of these conversions—that it was in this that the interposition of God was so clearly manifested—that those conversions partook very much of the miraculous in their nature ; at least could not be accounted for, often, unless on the principle of a divine miracle. It was the great and good God setting his seal to the work of his own Church. These very Indians, heathen and savage as they had been, were real converts ; and the proofs of the reality of their conversion were undoubted and convincing : so much so, that after the missionary had left them—after he had remained absent from them for two years—after they had been left without farther instruction of any kind beyond the memory of his teaching—after he had returned to his missionary station at the close of these two years, and was again among these very Indians, he of course, as was his duty, required of them to come to confession—to confess their sins that they might receive absolution ; but he was agreeably surprised, and indeed over-joyed, to find that not one of them had any sins to confess ! My friend went on to explain, that there was no matter for the sacrament of penance, as during these two years the Indians lived such converted lives, such holy and christian lives, that there was not one among them who had committed a single sin ; and they therefore had no sins to confess, and the missionary priest was unable to confer absolution, inasmuch as there was no matter for the sacrament !

I could not but be surprised at such a statement, and wondered in my own mind, whether my reverend friend himself believed it; and yet there was all the look and stamp of earnestness and truthfulness in the man. He seemed to believe it fully, and therefore, as unwilling to wound his feelings, I merely suggested that the Indians having no sin to confess, might have arisen from their not knowing their sins—from their not knowing that those customs, vices, immoralities, cruelties and idolatries, which they were constantly committing, were really sins—in short they were so ignorant of Christian truth, and so left without religious instruction, that they were unconscious of sin, and therefore confessed no sin. I said that I could not otherwise understand his statement, because the best and wisest and holiest christians that ever lived, were conscious of sin; and that if those Indians were really converted, they must have been conscious of sin; and to suppose them otherwise, must imply that they were wholly unconverted.

This suggestion he rejected and flung from him at once, and he eagerly added that this very missionary was now at Rome—that he had just returned from America, and was at the Collegio Romano, where he had himself heard him narrate the facts; and as a proof beyond question of the reality of the conversions, and the holiness of the Indians, he mentioned what he called a most wonderful miracle that had occurred, when the missionary was administering the holy communion to them. He was holding the host in his fingers thus—my friend suiting the action to the word—and as the poor Indian was too far from him, the missionary priest could not place the host in his mouth: the poor humble devout Indian knelt so far away that the priest could not reach him, and—here my reverend friend lifted his hands in an attitude of awe, looked devoutly to heaven, and then earnestly and solemnly addressed me—the host flew out of his fingers, flew over to the poor Indian, and flew into his mouth ! “ Oh ! ” he added, in a tone of the most reverential devotion, “ the blessed Lord Jesus so loved that poor savage, that he longed to enter into his heart, and thus miraculously flew into his mouth ! How anxious he was to get into him ! ”

I could no longer doubt the sincerity of this priest. There was a fervor, an earnestness, a devotion of manner, that shewed he fully believed what he thus narrated ; and the personal character of the man was such that I had no right to doubt him after so solemn a statement. He narrated it as a miracle wrought by God in behalf of the Church of Rome. He mentioned it as illustrating the blessing of God upon the missions of that Church. He, believing that the age of miracles is not yet passed, but that miracles are still constantly working, imagined that his narrative would be credited by me. But it only proved to my mind, that the missionary priest had wickedly invented the story to exalt and magnify his own labors, and was now telling it among his brother Jesuits of the Collegio Romano, that such of them as were simple and credulous and superstitious enough to believe it, might spread it through the world, as a new testimony of God to the Church of Rome. My reverend friend evidently believed it, and expected that I should believe it.

I shall never forget this portion of our conversation. It was a practical confutation of those—and I must confess I was myself once among the number—who suppose that the Romish priests are all infidels—that the simple and superstitious and ignorant may perhaps believe what they are taught; but that the talented and educated are infidel as to some of the doctrines which they inculcate. I am fully persuaded that, while this may be true of some, it is not true of many whose acquaintance I was enabled to make during my residence at Rome. They were educated, learned, astute, and talented men; and yet they believed things contrary to all experience, reason and revelation. The reverend Jesuit, who made to me the communication respecting these Indians, was one of the most polished and educated men at Rome. He was conversant with the entire range of European literature. He spoke English, German and French, with almost the same facility as his native Italian; and was as learned and astute as a man might be expected to be, who was selected for a professorship in the principal educational establishment of the order of Jesuits at Rome. He fully believed, and expected me to believe, his narrative. This certainly is a phase of mind not very intelligible in England; but when it is considered that these men are brought up from childhood in certain principles—that they are taught to believe implicitly everything which the Church is said to teach—that they never see the Holy Scriptures, which might call in question the principles which they are thus taught—that, believing that miracles are still as constantly wrought as in the days of the Apostles—that looking on every doubt in the mind as a horrid infidelity to be hated and loathed, as the source of every woe here and hereafter—that being thus habituated to receive implicitly everything that seems to come in conformity with the Church,—their minds are in a different train, and act on a different principle altogether, and they must not be judged by the same rules as might hold among us, whose minds are so differently constituted and trained. I am fully convinced that in supposing all these men—however it may be with some—to be secretly infidels, we do them the greatest injustice. I am satisfied that multitudes among them believe, with the fullest and most implicit faith, the dogmas of their Church ; and therefore, instead of regarding them as the hypocrites and monsters of deception and wickedness which such a supposition implies, I regard them as melancholy evidences of the fall of human nature, and sad monuments of the shipwreck of the human judgment, evidencing to the world that no reach of human intellect, and no grasp of mental genius, and no range of this world's learning, can bring the true and saving knowledge of God to the mind or heart of man. The record may be a saddening one, but it is true : “ The world by wisdom knew not God.”

It was impossible my reverend friend could fail to observe my incredulity, both as to the sinless state of the Indian converts, and as to the wonderful miracle of the consecrated wafer or host. I could not believe them, and I felt I ought not to leave him under the possible impression that I did believe them. I expressed my feeling in the most kindly and courteous terms, being very unwilling to give unnecessary pain or offence ; but I let him clearly understand that I had read and heard enough of the missions, to hold a very decided opinion as to the argument often drawn from them. I added that I believed that the real difference between the missionary results of the two Churches was this—that the Church of Rome was generally satisfied with an outward conformity, or rather an outward profession, however little the practice might be ; looking forward to the opportunities which such conformity or profession secured in reference to the rising generation ; while on the other hand the Church of England almost universally required the manifestation of a converted mind and regenerated nature ; disregarding in a measure all the worldly considerations of expediency, or value of external profession. I added yet farther, that under such circumstances I was prepared to expect even greater appearance of success under the system of Rome ; but, on the other hand far more of reality and spiritual life under the system of England.

After a little further conversation on the subject of missions, and the success said to be attendant upon them—after he had made some allusions to the success of the Jesuits in China, to which I replied by referring to the Bull of Pope Ganganelli, condemning the compliances of the Jesuits in that empire—after this, my friend still urged that the Church of England was inclining to her ruin ; and that I should be obliged ere long to leave her, and after all should be necessitated to join the Church of Rome.

I said that I was fully convinced in my soul, that a Church which, like that of England, honoured the word of God, the Holy Scriptures, so as to make them the sole rule of faith in things necessary to salvation, and which held so much precious truth, would never be abandoned by God. He had blessed her hitherto to the salvation of millions, and I had no fears for her permanence ; but at all events I had not seen any reason to suppose I could join myself to the Church of Rome. She had too frequently erred in things of the greatest importance.

He replied that God promised to be for ever with his Church—that his Church was founded on St. Peter—that that Church was the Catholic or Roman Church—that by the promise of Christ it was infallible ; and that I should find it impossible to prove her to have failed in any particular. He went on upon this subject at some length, in a way very usual among the advocates of the Roman Church, and asked me to prove that she had erred in anything.

I answered that as he would probably defend as a truth, anything I should object to as an error, I did not see clearly how I could convince him, unless indeed I could prove an absolute contradiction of one doctrine to another. I said this with the view of leading to this very subject.

He said that that would be an objection worth hearing, and seemed to challenge me to the proof.

Fully expecting this, I replied by saying that I believed there were some very decided and positive contradictions, in the system of doctrines received by the Church of Rome ; and if it were not drawing too much on his patience, I would endeavour to specify an instance, and perhaps he might be able to remove the apparent inconsistency by explanation. But, I added, while such inconsistencies or contradictions remained unexplained, it was impossible to recognise the infallibility of his Church ; and though I had presented the difficulty to many eminent men for solution, I had never been so fortunate as to find even an attempt at explanation.

I then called his attention to the fact, that the sacrifice of the mass is called “an unbloody sacrifice ;” that when

Protestants object, that if the sacrifice of the mass be indeed identical with the sacrifice of Christ on the cross, then this daily sacrificing of Christ must be a source of daily suffering to Christ :—for, as the Apostle Paul says, “ He was not to offer himself often, for then he must have suffered often since the foundation of the world : ”—when Protestants object, that if the sacrifice of the mass be often offered, according to the system of the Church of Rome, then the sufferings of Christ must be often repeated, according to the words of the Apostle—when Protestants object this, it is always answered that there are no sufferings, because there is only “ an unbloody sacrifice, ” and that in the sacrifice of the mass, Christ is offered only in “ an unbloody manner. ” It is therefore expressly stated in the Canons of the Council of Trent, that the mass is an “ unbloody sacrifice ; ” and all the catechisms of the Church of Rome distinctly assert, that it is “ an unbloody offering ; ” and all endeavour to obviate the objection of Protestants, by saying that Christ is offered in the mass in “ an unbloody manner. ”

He assented to this, stating that such was the doctrine of the mass, that Christ was offered as a propitiatory sacrifice for the living and the dead, in the mass, and that there could be no pain or suffering to him, though truly, literally, substantially present in the host as the victim, because he was offered in “ an unbloody manner. ” It was “ an unbloody sacrifice, ” and therefore it gave no pain like that on Calvary ; and he asked me where there was any contradiction or inconsistency ?

I replied, that I had only stated one half my subject. The other half remained to be told, which was this—that the dogma of Transubstantiation, as defined by the Council of Trent, and held universally in the Church of Rome, taught that the bread and wine of the communion were truly, literally, substantially changed, so as that their whole substance was changed into the substance of “the body, and blood, and soul, and divinity” of Jesus Christ. According to this doctrine the substance of wine is annihilated, and the substance of blood substituted in its stead, so as that all is no longer wine but blood, truly, literally, substantially blood. In the offering therefore of this there is blood, a bloody offering, and in the sacrifice of this there is blood, a bloody sacrifice; and there is no point of doctrine in the whole system of the Church of Rome, on which she usually makes so determined a stand as this assertion, that after the words of consecration the elements become flesh and blood; and thus the inconsistency or contradiction to which I referred was this—her teaching in one moment, that in the mass the sacrifice is an unbloody one, and in the next moment, that it is transubstantiated into blood; so that in one doctrine all is blood, and in the other all is unbloody!

My friend made no attempt at concealing, that he had never observed this before, but he was silent as if revolving it in his mind. He continued so long without replying, that I asked him whether he clearly understood me, and saw the point which I urged. He said fairly that he saw it—that it charged the Church with using the argument both ways and in opposite directions, asserting that there was blood, or teaching that there was no blood, just as suited her purpose. He added very honestly, after a long time for consideration, that he had never heard the difficulty before—that it struck him as very curious—that he did not see just then how to answer it ; but that he would make it his business to consult a certain Lecturer then in their College, and also their Professor, to whom such questions belonged ; and that after consulting them he would communicate to me their opinions.

[When next I had the pleasure of meeting him, it was at the Collegio Romano, where we walked and talked a long time together ; but though he stated he had consulted the parties referred to, I was unable to get any intelligible explanation of the inconsistency which I had urged, nor indeed have I ever heard it explained by any one, to whom I have objected it.]

On reverting to our original point, namely, his statement that the Anglican Church was hastening to her fall, and that I should be necessitated to embrace the Church of Rome, a variety of topics were touched on, and among them the doctrine of the immaculate conception ; on this he expressed himself as believing that the Virgin Mary, the Prophet Jeremiah, and John the Baptist, had all been born without original sin.

My wife remarked that she could not believe this, for that the Virgin Mary recognised Christ as her Saviour, which implied herself a sinner—that the writings of the prophet Jeremiah were full of acknowledgments of sin—that the Baptist certainly was without all claim to so peculiar an exemption, and she was opening the Bible to shew the places to which she referred.

He said that the doctrine was founded on the words of Scripture—that there could be no question as to the immaculate conception of the most Holy Virgin, and therefore her freedom from original sin: and that in reference to Jeremiah and the Baptist, it was expressly stated that they were “sanctified from the womb,” implying that in their original conception in the womb, they were immaculate, and as such exempt from original sin.

I could not forbear smiling at such a frail foundation for such a doctrine, and reminded him that the word “sanctified,” as ordinarily used in Holy Scripture, meant, being separated to a holy use,—being set apart from all profane or secular uses, and appropriated or separated to the holy purposes of God, and that this was the case of the Baptist. From the time of his leaving the womb of his mother, that is, from the time of his birth, it pleased God to set him apart, and separate him for the holy purpose of being the Herald or Forerunner of the Messiah.

He replied at once that this was a proof, if proof were wanting, that we could never settle our differences by referring to the Holy Scriptures, inasmuch as we could never agree as to their interpretation. He would not therefore refer to them, but would ask, whether it was possible to doubt the miraculous and immaculate conception of the most Holy Mary, or that she was perfectly sinless—free from all original and actual sin alike? On perceiving that we dissented altogether on this point, he continued to say that there could be no doubt that she possessed merit—that she was meritorious in the sight of God. On still perceiving that we dissented from such an opinion, he continued to say, that he did not see how any one could deny that there was merit in works, and that assuredly there was merit in the sufferings undergone by the blessed Mary, in giving birth to the child Jesus. There was no necessity whatever—no reason whatever why she should have subjected herself to them, and therefore her having actually undergone such sufferings was meritorious. It must have possessed merit in the sight of God. She had some claim upon God for it. There are many things, he added, which the Church calls counsels, not commands, and the difference respecting these is, that you are under obligation or necessity to perform commands ; you must obey them or you sin against God ; but you are under no sort of obligation or necessity to perform counsels. They are, as it were, an advice for increased usefulness or increased holiness, over and beyond what is necessary for salvation ; and if a man perform these, he has merit in the sight of God, because he has performed them, and thus has made himself more useful and holy than necessary. There was, for example, no kind of necessity upon the young man in the gospel, obliging him to give all he possessed to the poor ; but there was counsel, advice, and he was not bound to take that advice, even though given by our Lord himself ; but if he had followed that advice, then undoubtedly he would have had merit with God.

My wife replied to all this with expressions of surprise, that any one could hold the doctrine of human merit—that if we but knew our own hearts, we could not but feel ourselves such poor unworthy creatures, such poor miserable sinners, that it seemed impossible to arrive at such a height of presumption, as to imagine we could have merit in the sight of God. We never do—we never can do enough for the God who has done so much for us ; and how, she asked, how is it possible for us to do more than enough ? Even after we have done our very utmost, our all, we yet are unworthy sinners : and therefore our Lord has expressly said, "After ye have done all, say, We are all unprofitable servants, we have done that which it was our duty to do."

He said that the Church taught that there was a merit in some works—that those works were not natural works, but done by the grace of God, and that God was pleased of his own grace to ascribe merit to them. It was in this way the saints had merit with God. They had by God's grace been enabled to live very holy lives, and to endure many sufferings and to perform many good works. They had been enabled to do all this only by God's grace, and as all this was not necessary to their own salvation, but was supplemental or supernumerary, so all this was meritorious, and thus gave them an accumulation of merit with God. But still there was nothing presumptuous in this, as it was from first to last of God's grace.

I said here that I was anxious to understand him clearly: I understood him as saying that although the merit of works was only a merit ascribed to them of the grace of God, and not truly and rightfully belonging to them, yet that the merit was as effectual as if it truly and rightfully belonged to them; so that a man having performed some such work, might fairly reckon on it and take account of merit for it, and set it down against his sins—against the punishment his sins deserved. I added, that I inferred that this was his view, from what he had just said of the merits of the saints, implying as I thought, that by such works of merit, a man might obtain or work out for himself more merit than he wanted for his forgiveness and salvation. In short a man could be more righteous, holy, and meritorious than God required of him.

He assented to this.

I then asked, whether I was so to understand him as implying that a man might, by following the counsels of the Church, of which he spoke, obtain a large accession of merit, and then set this down, so to speak,—if I might speak it with reverence,—in a sort of account with God, as if keeping a debtor-and-creditor account with God ; and that thus, by increasing the sum of his meritorious actions, so far lessen the balance of sin that was against him, and thus lessen the amount of suffering or punishment for his sins.

He smiled and said, that though it seemed an unusual way of stating the point, yet the truth was very much as I stated it—that this merit went to lessen, not the sins, as I had said, but the temporary sufferings and temporary punishment due to his sins. He added that the truth was that the Church taught more than this, namely, that as a man could work out for himself more merit than was required for his own salvation—that as a man could thus accumulate merit, superfluous and supererogatory, it formed or went to form a sort of treasury of superabundant merits in the Church.

I replied that I had so understood the doctrine of the Church of Rome—that I had lately procured a small volume just published by the order of Jesuits, setting forth all “ the pious works ” to which certain specified indulgences are attached ; and that in this volume it is expressly stated, that the superabundant merits of individuals —the merits which they have possessed over and beyond what was required for their own salvation, formed a sort of treasury of merit in the Church ; and that the Pope, as the Head of the Church, had the disposal of all this superfluous merit, and could apply it to persons here or in purgatory as it might seem good to him—that thus he could lessen the period of suffering in the fires of purgatory, by what was called a partial indulgence, and annihilate the whole by what was called a plenary indulgence. I added that this was a doctrine too evident in everything that was to be seen in Rome, and that all my views of the truth of Holy Scripture—all my opinions of God's revealed word—all my feelings as to my own poor sinful soul, which ought to be humbled to the dust, revolted against such notions. The doctrine of human merit seemed to me unbecoming and unnatural, irreconcileable with human experience, and contrary to the plainest language of Holy Scripture; but bad and unseemly as it was in itself, it seemed to me hideous and monstrous when carried to the outrageous extravagance of constituting a treasury of superfluous merits, for the pope or any poor mortal to distribute or apportion to others in the way of indulgences to release them from purgatory.

He said that he was not surprised at our repugnance to it, and that he could not expect that we should receive it at first; but that after some more instruction we should feel the difficulty pass away, in this as in many other particulars.

My wife said that nothing could reconcile us to this. It always was and always must be a fatal objection to the Church of Rome, with all earnest and sincere Christians. She could never forget that it was this very point, carried out in the matter of indulgences, that first led Martin Luther to the work of the Reformation; and she added, that day after day it was forced upon her memory at Rome, for whenever she looked on that noble church of St. Peter's, she could never fail to remember the means by which much of it was erected ;—that a large amount of the money to defray the cost of its erection, was raised by the sale of indulgences ; so that in her memory and imagination, the Reformation of Luther was always connected with the erection of St. Peter's—the unscriptural doctrines of human merit and of papal indulgences.

I was unwilling that this subject should pass away hastily, as if it were not a matter of the first and last importance, and therefore I remarked, with the view of leading farther into a subject involving so much of the essence of the Gospel, that Martin Luther felt very strongly on the point of human merit, and that he held that a man could never be justified by works, and could only be justified by faith in Christ. He held that the doctrine of justification was the question by which a standing and a falling church were to be distinguished.

He replied with great vehemence that Luther was a bad man—an immoral man, inasmuch as his writings led to immorality, and his life was horribly immoral—that he held that no actions were good—that there were no good works—that it was no matter whether a man did good or evil—in short it was perfectly astounding the wickedness which he taught ; and yet, he added, Luther was a great man—a man of wonderful talent and power, and he stopped at nothing. He was a great man, but he was an awful one. He shewed in his writings that his opinion was against all good works—that there were no good works, and that even if there were, they were useless. The zeal and vehemence of my friend against Luther, led him to

I said that I apprehended that Luther was much misrepresented, and indeed that the doctrine of the gospel and of the Anglican Church, was much misunderstood, on the subject of faith on the one hand, and works on the other. I then narrated an interesting incident of a Roman Catholic priest, who once called on me in private to lay open the state of his mind. We had long and deeply interesting conversations on many points, but there remained what he regarded as a fatal objection to the Church of England and all Protestant Churches. They all, as he said, flung good works aside, and taught that men could be saved without them, and he felt that no man could be saved unless he lived a holy life unto God. The reply which I made to him was, that he was evidently under a mistake—that all Protestant Churches, and especially the Church of England, held the necessity of holiness or good works; but in a different way, and for a different end from what he imagined. The truth of the Holy Scriptures, I said, was this: There is the Son of God, and there is the Holy Ghost, both the second and third persons of the Trinity—both the one and the other of these has his own peculiar or special department in the economy of a man's salvation. The work or office of the Son, Jesus Christ, is to justify us, that is, to take away our sins, and make us accepted through his merits in the sight of God. This is called our justification, and it is ours solely through faith in Jesus Christ, without any works or deserving on our part. It is wholly through faith and without works. But this, I said, was the office or department of Jesus Christ. There was then the office and department of the Holy Spirit. He was to take in hand those who were justified by faith, and He was to make them holy ; holy in thought, holy in feeling, holy in desire, holy in aspirations, and holy in their whole lives, leading them and teaching them, and enabling them to live in prayer and humility and good works, and all that partook of the example of Jesus Christ. And thus, I continued, we hold that our justification, which is the office of the Son of God, is solely by faith and without works, while we hold that our sanctification, which is the work of the Holy Ghost, is manifested in every good word and work. Now Protestants hold both one and the other of these, but we do not like to confound them. We hold that the justification by Jesus Christ is necessary, and we also hold that the sanctification by the Holy Spirit is also necessary—the former being through faith, the latter being a consequence and never a cause of the former ; and therefore it ought never to be said of our Protestant Churches, that we reject the practice of good works. We put both faith and works in their proper and relative places, and we do not like to confound them, and we shrink from supposing that there is merit in either the one or the other. I added that this view of the question completely satisfied the Roman Catholic priest, and shortly afterwards he renounced the Church of Rome, and is now a minister of the Church of England.

My reverend friend listened to this very attentively, and stated that he quite understood it, but he wished to know why we denied merit to the good and holy works of the justified man.

so much, when I rather wished to be informed by hearing his opinions ; but that if he could bear a little with me, I would endeavour to make some excuse for our Protestant views on this subjeet. I then said, that we held that poor and infirm and sinful creatures, such as we are, can do no good thing ; that is, nothing good in the searching eye of a Holy God, unless as His Holy Spirit gives us His grace. It is not we, but the Holy Spirit that does the good work in us. If we have a good thought—if we have a holy wish—if we have an heavenly desire—if we have done a good thing, it has been the Holy Spirit who has planted it in us, or enabled us to do it. Whatever holy thought we think, and whatever good work we are enabled to perform, the praise and merit belong not to us, but to the Holy Spirit who has done it in us. The merit is His and not ours, and it is a wrong and injury to Him for us to claim it as if it were ours. The great truth, I said, was this—our good and holy works, so far from making us creditors with God, as if we had a claim on him on account of our merits, do really bring us in more and more debtors to God. The more holy thoughts we have, and the more good works we do, even so much the more are we made debtors unto God the Holy Ghost, by whose inspiration we were enabled to think the one or do the other. It has been some new and additional afflatus of the Holy Spirit, and it therefore makes us debtors more than ever. This, I added, was the view I took of this subjeet ; feeling that our hearts were poor, weak, miserable things, and that when rightly conscious of our real state, as our fallen hearts appear before God, the very last thought that can be congenial to the mind, is that which could have connection with human merit.

I cannot say that my reverend friend was much affected by this mode of stating the subject. He heard it however with marked attention and respect. It seemed to commend itself to his better feelings, and I could only pray that the time might come, when circumstances might bring such views home to his convictions and his heart.

He merely said that there was what the Church called the humility of merit, and that the sentiments I had uttered were of that nature. He then turned away to some opinions of St. Augustine and St. Bernard, and on these we conversed for a short time, and soon afterwards he retired with his companion.

NOTE.

In the foregoing conversation I endeavoured to exhibit a manifest inconsistency between the doctrine of Transubstantiation and the doctrine of the Mass. By the former it is taught that the wine is changed into the blood of Christ, and that thus there is the presence of blood. By the latter it is expressly taught that the offering is an unbloody one; in other words, that the mass is an unbloody offering of blood.

This inconsistency received no solution at the time when I urged it, but it has been since deemed deserving or requiring some explanation. It will be seen at once that it has come from Rome, and especially from the Collegio Romano. It is as follows :

“ Again, he makes his Jesuit opponent confounded at being told, for the first time in his life, that the Mass is called an un-

bloody sacrifice, which he conceives is a manifest contradiction to the doctrine of transubstantiation, which teaches that the blood of our blessed Lord is actually offered. On this mare's nest of our author's we cannot forbear quoting Father Mazio's remarks. 'I will only say a few words,' he says, 'on that terrible dilemma on the sacrifice of the Mass, which, according to his affirmation, puzzled me so much, that I declared I would consult some professor of theology on it, though I never afterwards gave a solution; nay, no divine, however eminent, could even attempt to give an explanation of it. How is the Mass called an unbloody sacrifice, if the wine is transubstantiated into blood? It is on one side all blood, and on the other all unbloody!.... When I read first this objection (because I never heard it from him), I laughed very heartily; and surely every sensible Catholic must do so. I would ask Mr. Seymour what he means by bloody? Is it the presence of blood, or the effusion of it, which makes a thing bloody? If the former, then a scholastic debate would be a bloody conflict, because the contenders have living blood in their veins, and very hot too. If the latter, then how could he propose an objection such as the above-mentioned? In the sacrifice of the Cross there was a real effusion of all the blood from Christ's body, so that his blood was separated from it, and He died. But no such real effusion of the blood is there, or can there be, in the sacrifice of the Mass. It is, indeed, the Catholic doctrine and belief, that by the words of the consecration the substance of the wine is changed into Christ's blood; but this is by way of concomitance with the body, soul, and divinity of Christ; because Christ cannot suffer any more—non confractus, non concitus: He is in a glorified state, and his blood cannot exist without the whole humanity and divinity. The effusion, then, and immolation, is but a mystical one; that is, the words of the double consecration have, by Divine institution, such an efficacy as to make directly and distinctly (though not separately) present, by the transubstantiation of the bread and the wine, the body of Christ in one case, the blood of Christ in the other, though by concomitance the whole Christ is present in both. By this distinction of consecration and double direct presence, Christ is represented dying as a victim ; and so, as the Council of Trent expresses it, the victim offered is the same with that on the cross, viz. Christ really, truly, and substantially present ; though the manner of offering it is different, the one being bloody, the other unbloody.' ”

The meaning of all this, cleared of such cloudy verbiage as “ the words of double consecration,” and “ double direct presence,” and such language of obscurity—seems to be that the victim is real, but the sacrifice unreal—that the victim is bloody, but the sacrifice unbloody. In other words, that Christ is present, but is not sacrificed—is present with his blood, but not sacrificed with the shedding of his blood.

It not unfrequently occurs, that in endeavouring to escape from one difficulty we become inextricably entangled in another.

The Canons of the Council of Trent assert, and pronounce an anathema against all who deny it, that “ in the mass there is offered a true, proper, and propitiatory sacrifice for sins.” And the Council specifies the victim and asserts its immolation ; “ since in this divine sacrifice, which is performed in the mass, the very same Christ is contained, and immolated unbloodily, who offered himself bloody on the altar of the cross, the Holy Council teaches that that sacrifice is truly propitiatory.”

In order to form a right conception of the essentials of a propitiatory sacrifice, we must look to the propitiatory sacrifices of the former dispensation. The slightest knowledge of these shows the necessity of two things, namely, the presence or offering of a living victim, and then its immolation or shedding of its blood to death. The living victim was produced, offered, and accepted in the name and in the stead of the transgressor. It was then immolated, and its blood shed unto death, thus undergoing the sentence of the law in the name and in the stead of the transgressor. The Lord Jesus Christ became our victim. His bleeding and dying on the cross was the immolation.

It is held by the Church of Rome that the propitiatory sacrifice of the mass is the very same—one and identical with the propitiatory sacrifice of Christ on the cross. And that it therefore has the very same propitiatory power—the one and identical atoning efficacy as that of the cross. This dogma is founded on transubstantiation—on the notion that the bread and wine, in other words, that the consecrated host or wafer, is literally and in essential substance, the same Jesus Christ who died on the cross. They thus hold that they have the same victim.

But even supposing—which may be done for the sake of argument—that they have the very same victim, it is apparent that that is not enough to constitute a propitiatory sacrifice. There must be the bloodshedding and death of that victim. The latter is manifestly as essential as the former, for the production of the victim under the law was not the sacrifice, but only the preliminary to the sacrifice. The immolation and bloodshedding must follow, or it is nothing.

Yet they admit here that there is not, and that there cannot be, in the sacrifice of the mass, either the death or the shedding of blood, or the immolation of the victim ; in other words, that the victim is not a victim, and the sacrifice is not a sacrifice ! They say—

“ In the sacrifice of the cross there was a real effusion of all the blood of Christ’s body, so that His blood was separated from it, and He died. But no such real effusion of the blood is there, or can there be, in the sacrifice of the Mass. It is indeed the Catholic doctrine and belief that by the words of consecration the substance of the wine is changed into Christ's blood; but this is by way of concomitance with the body, soul, and divinity of Christ, because Christ cannot suffer any more,—non confractus, non concisus. He is in a glorified state, and his blood cannot exist without the whole humanity and divinity. The effusion then, and immolation, is but a mystical one."

There is here, not a parallel, to shew the identity of the sacrifice of the mass with the sacrifice of the cross, but a contrast, to shew their complete diversity! There is the same victim, but not the same death—the same victim, but not the same immolation—the same victim, but not the same shedding of blood. And the reason assigned, namely, that "He is in a glorified state," and therefore cannot die, cannot shed his blood, cannot be immolated, is demonstration that the so-called sacrifice of the mass is not the same with the sacrifice of the cross.

The language of Holy Scripture is explicit: "It is the blood that maketh atonement for the soul," and "without shedding of blood there is no remission." And therefore if the mass be unbloody—if there be no shedding of blood, there is in it neither atonement nor remission.

Nor is there reason or consistency in such an interpretation of the words of our Lord—"This is my blood which is shed for you," as these doctrines require. In order to have the same victim that died on the cross (as transubstantiation requires) they insist on a literal interpretation of the words, "This is my blood," and in order to avoid the charge of shedding his blood (as involved in the sacrifice of the mass) they insist on a mystical or figurative interpretation of the latter words “ which is shed for you ! ” And thus they pretend that the victim is real, and the shedding of blood figurative ! Here is the true inconsistency of the system ; they pretend to have a real victim, but a figurative shedding of its blood—a real victim, but a figurative death—a real victim, but a figurative sacrifice. In other words, they profess to have a bloody victim, but an unbloody sacrifice. The doctrine of transubstantiation requires the presence of blood ; the doctrine of the mass requires the sacrifice to be unbloody !

CHAPTER X.

THE CELIBACY OF THE CLERGY—A NEW BEATITUDE—GRACE GIVEN IN THE SACRAMENT OF MATRIMONY—CERTAINTY IN THE CHURCH OF ROME—CONSECRATION OF THE MASS—OTHER UNCERTAINTIES—INTERPRETATION OF HOLY SCRIPTURE.

WHENEVER I had reason to expect a visit from one of the Jesuits, I considered beforehand what subject I should suggest for conversation: I felt that in general it was in my power to lead the conversation in any direction, or to any topic upon which I might be disposed to ask for information. But there were occasions when my visitors took the lead, or rather, when I was obliged in courtesy, to continue the subject introduced by them. And this sometimes led me into topics which I should never have selected, but which I could not avoid.

It was an occasion of this kind when one of my friends, with whom I had conversed much and often, was announced. He came from the Collegio Romano.

I apologized for my apparent inattention in not returning his many visits, excusing myself on the plea, most truly urged, that I was incessantly occupied in visiting the ruins of classic Rome, and the churches of Christian Rome ; and I added that my attendance on the several funcioni, or ceremonies, processions, exhibitions, and other offices of the Church, interesting as they were to me, absorbed my whole time.

He replied with great kindness and affability, most courteously saying that as we were “religious” (i. e. under sacred vows, from religo, to bind) we must be frati, as brothers, and not stand on ceremony with each other. He added that there was much to be given up—much to be denied to ourselves, and that we must live in a state of self-denial, a state of separation. He said this with the appearance of more meaning than the words themselves seemed to imply ; and then turning to my wife, said to her expressively, that really the “religious” [the term usually applied to all who, as monks or nuns, are members of monastic establishments, have taken the vow of celibacy, &c.] had much to endure, for they had much to abandon and renounce,—that they are obliged by their vows to separate themselves from every thing, giving up the world and forming no ties, none of the ties of life with the world. They are often, he said, obliged to forsake or resign riches, rank, all, and to live in a state of constant self-denial. And this was no easy matter. The way to everlasting life was narrow ;—our Lord had said, “Strait is the gate and narrow is the way that leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it.” It was indeed far—very far from an easy course ; for we must deny ourselves and take up our cross daily.

Many—very many of the “religious” give up their all in this world for this cross. Some of us are nobles and wealthy, even princes, and yet they have given up all. Even myself, he added, I gave up all, I ought not to speak of myself, but I had an independent fortune. However, we must deny ourselves, and give up all for the glory of God. We must do something for ourselves. God gives us the power to help ourselves, and with that power we must do something to advance ourselves the narrow way of eternal life. “We must leave father, and mother, and brethren, and sisters, and wife,” and all, we must give up all, we must separate from all, but there is a promise that we shall be recompensed. We must do something for ourselves.

He continued in this strain for some time without any interruption from either my wife or myself. We remained in the attitude of respectful listeners, assenting to much that fell from him, but feeling that there was something in his mind that went beyond the precise meaning of his words. He spoke so much of self-denial and separation, terms that at Rome ordinarily mean a life of celibacy, and he alluded so much to the “religious,” who are the monks and nuns of the monastic or conventional system, that he appeared to have something ulterior in view.

As soon as he concluded an address unusually long, and seemingly prepared for the occasion, my wife rose to withdraw to keep some engagement; but as she withdrew she said pleasantly to our friend, that she was sure he could not approve of the course taken by Mr. —, who was a married man, and who had put his wife into a nunnery, and thus made himself free—getting rid of his wife on the plea of religion!

He replied, laughing, that there was no knowing what she herself might yet do—that on a future opportunity he would mention an extraordinary fact which had led Mr. — to take so decided a step. But at all events it was a step which was not obligatory on all men, or to be required of any; that for himself he would never advise such a course, though he still felt that there were circumstances that might justify and even recommend it. That as for Mr. — and his wife, they were persons very pure-minded, and disinterested in the course they had taken—that as for her she really was an angel. But, he added, in allusion to my anticipated conversion, that Mrs. Seymour need not be uneasy on that point.

After a few sallies of pleasantry on so delicate a subject, my wife said she was not afraid, and withdrew to keep her engagement. The reverend Padre and myself sat down together.

He commenced at once the moment my wife had withdrawn, to say that it was a mark of the Catholic Church to be holy—and that it was a great mark of that holiness that her priests were holy—separated from the world—divested of the ties of life—prohibited from marriage, and thus holy and separated unto God. But, he added in an expressive tone—“This was not demanded of every man.”

I said that I had heard and read that a life of celibacy was held in the Church of Rome to be what they call a Counsel, or Advice, that is, a course which may well be recommended and advised, but which was not absolutely obligatory;—that a man obtained merit with God for living in that state, but that he was under no obligation so far as his salvation was concerned, to follow it.

He stated, that such was the true state of the question, but that in claiming merit for a state of celibacy, there was nothing implied in prejudice of the state of marriage. On the other hand, according to the Catholic faith, marriage was a sacrament, and actually conferred a special grace—a sacramental grace. But, he added, married people know how they may separate at times in order that they may be holy.

I said that I believed that I understood him.

He rejoined, that he was sure I fully apprehended him—that the fact was that there was a grace given in Orders in the Catholic Church—that they were not ordained to the Priesthood till they had attained a certain age, when they knew by experience that they could continue holy—and when they knew all their difficulties and temptations, and at the same time understood what they were doing, before they took the final vows. And then there was a grace—a special grace for the Priests of the Catholic Church, by which they were able to keep themselves pure and holy, and free from the feelings and desires and passions of other men. And you, he added, you know that both our Lord and St. Paul have recommended a life of celibacy.

I remarked, in as gentle and conversational a tone as I could command, that whatever were my views and impressions as to celibacy as a theory, yet my experience of mankind was not calculated to satisfy me—that my experience in the world led me rather to regard the married men as a body, as generally more holy, in the sense of pureness from immorality and the sins of the flesh, than the unmarried men. I added, in a tone of quiet confidence, that though

I fully believed, and indeed knew, that many who had taken the vows, had lived not only in celibacy, but also in chastity, yet I believed that in the main it was far otherwise. I expressed myself with as much gentleness as I could command, in speaking on a subject neither very delicate nor very easy ; but I said plainly that I entertained a very decided feeling against celibacy—the enforced celibacy of the clergy. They, of all men, ought to be married.

He said that the Catholic Church had always enforced celibacy on her Priesthood—that our Lord and St. Paul had recommended it to all men—that the Primitive Fathers had all practised it—and that in all ages of the Church it was the universal tradition. And he added, the Priesthood was certainly pure, the Priests were very holy, for that there was a special grace in the Catholic Church for them.

I repeated, as if speaking reluctantly, but firmly, that my experience of the world was against the system—that men who had a knowledge of the world and of the realities of human nature, were generally against it. And that however it might be, and certainly was, advantageous to the Church of Rome in a political sense, as isolating her clergy, and so separating them as to make them independent of the ordinary ties of life and of society ; yet that it was practically not conducive to morality, but mischievous both to the individuals and to society.

He repelled this very warmly—indeed with more warmth than was becoming—and he challenged me to specify particulars.

I felt that the subject was a difficult one—difficult from its own nature—difficult from the warmth exhibited by my friend—and specially difficult when I considered that celibacy was too much regarded as identified with morality and holiness in Rome ; so that in impeaching the system of an enforced celibacy, I seemed in a manner impeaching the morality and holiness of the ecclesiastics of Rome, with all their convents of monks and monasteries of nuns. I felt my difficulty, and endeavoured to reply to his warm expressions with all the coolness and collectedness I could command, saying that my feeling was shared in common by some countries devoted to the Church of Rome—that both in Mexico and the Brazils the priesthood had petitioned the Pope within the last few years for permission to marry—that the permission being refused, they were in large numbers living in a state of concubinage—and that the population did not conceal their feeling that such men were to be preferred, as being more respectable in their conduct, as being actually less injurious to the peace of families and the general morality of society. I added that I could form no opinion on such a state of things, farther than as I had read of it in the works of modern travellers in those countries, but that he himself could not but be aware that within the last few years a petition had been addressed to the Pope on the subject from some of the Austrian priesthood, praying for a rescinding of the prohibition of marriage, and that the Pope had noticed it in very strong terms in his encyclical letters. I therefore said expressively that my friend could not be ignorant of the fact.

He made no reply to this, but seemed to me as if waiting for me to let out my whole mind, that he might dispose of my objections at once. I therefore added, that whatever might be said in favour of a state of celibacy in those persons who could honestly live in it, as no doubt many good men did, yet a celibacy imposed on a large body, and imposed on that large body without any exceptions,—a large body like the priesthood, and monks, and friars, and other ecclesiastical persons, all men of like passions, and the same flesh and blood as the laity—a celibacy thus imposed on young men at the age of twenty-three, and then enforced on all their after-life, could not in the nature of things but work injuriously among so large and numerous a body, whose very profession opens to them such great and numerous opportunities.

He could not conceal the warmth of his feelings at this statement. He shewed both anger and indignation at my remarks, as if he felt them personal to himself. In this he was most mistaken, for there was no man in Rome to whom I should less willingly have applied what I had said, for I believed him to be a good man, according to his views. But there is no subject on which the Roman priesthood feels so keenly as on this subject of celibacy. He was led by his feelings to express himself very strongly—indeed in terms too strong for courtesy. After some vehement and rather coarse expressions as to innovations, lies, falsehoods, &c., he proceeded to say, that the doctrine of a celibacy among the clergy was held in my own Church, the Church of England—that a large party of her clergy have practically adopted it, and are recommending it to others. He added, that although I might not be aware of it, he knew it to be the fact.

I said, as gently as I was able, that I was quite prepared to believe it—that I believed many of the Anglican clergy preferred a life of celibacy—that the great peculiarity of the English Church, as declared in her Articles is, that the clergy ought to marry or remain unmarried, according as they found it most favourable to holiness of life,—that the Church of England left to her clergy the most perfect freedom, forbidding nothing, except unholiness,—that her clergy therefore act in this matter, as seems best to their own judgment—that the Church does not interfere—that that which we object to is an imposed, an enforced celibacy. If a priest of the Church of Rome wishes to marry—if in his conscience he feels he ought to marry—if from his physical or natural constitution he must choose between sinning or marrying—you will not permit him, you compel him to keep the vow imposed and undertaken when he was yet only a youth, and had no real experience of human nature. It is to this celibacy—this imposed and enforced celibacy, and not to a voluntary celibacy, we object. I added, that if he alluded to any change of feeling on the subject among the Protestant clergy of England, he ought to remember that there was also a change of feeling in precisely the opposite direction, now working among the Romish clergy of Germany.

He answered very warmly, that these German priests were only a few contemptible rebels against the centre of unity, and that neither themselves nor their proceedings deserved notice. The Church, he said, was always in favour of a celibacy among the clergy—that St. Paul was decidedly in favour of it, saying, it was better to remain unmarried.

I said, that St. Paul certainly recommended, that in the then circumstances of the Christians, they would do well to avoid making unnecessary ties—that the destruction of Jerusalem was at hand—that all Christians must be prepared for persecution—that therefore at that present time it would be most wise to avoid every unnecessary tie or difficulty. The Apostle thus advised celibacy during the present distress, and assigns that cause, as well as that period for his advice. “I suppose,” says St. Paul, “that this is good for the present distress.” His advice, I added, was thus applicable to the then circumstances of trial and persecution of the Church, and was not intended to apply to the peaceful and tranquil times of Christianity.

He at once denied that the Apostle named, or designed to name any such limitation—that the Church was always in distress, always in trials, difficulties, sufferings, and thus the distress was always present; and that as the Church was always in “the present distress,” so the rule or recommendation of the Apostle was always applicable. And, besides this, our Lord, the blessed Jesus Christ himself has recommended it.

I said, I was not aware of it, and asked, wherein had our Lord recommended it?

His reply was to the effect, that he was sure that I remembered it, that I could not have forgotten it.

I stated, that I was not aware of what he alluded to, and that I did not recollect any words of our Lord conveying what he intimated.

He answered, with an expression of face somewhat surprised and mysterious, that surely I must remember it was one of the Beatitudes mentioned by our Lord.

I asked him what he meant, for that I did not understand him. I was not aware of our Lord declaring that celibacy was one of the Beatitudes.

“O yes,” he replied, “you must remember his words.

It is one of the Beatitudes,—you remember he says in his Sermon on the Mount, μακαριοὶ ἐστιν οἱ ἐυνουχοί.—It is one of the Beatitudes, you cannot but remember the words.”

I could not but smile at this new and strange Beatitude. My friend expressed himself in Italian, and I give his words in Greek for obvious reasons, especially as the Italian phrase is peculiarly objectionable to the general reader. I could not convince him that he had made a mistake. He was perfectly assured that this strange and unnatural state was really one of the Beatitudes mentioned by our Lord ; and I was wholly unable to convince him, until I produced the Greek Testament, and shewed him our Lord’s Sermon on the Mount. He seemed perfectly bewildered, so little do some of these theologians of Rome know of the Holy Scriptures !

A good deal that related to personal religion followed between us, and afterwards he said, that if I pursued the right way, there would be trial, separation from this world, and many prejudices to overcome, and influences to counteract ; but that my comfort and reward would be found connected with the great hereafter. He then returned to our previous topic, and said, that in the Catholic Church there was a peculiar grace for her priesthood, by which they were enabled to continue holy.

I asked whether he had any authority in Scripture—whether he could produce any promise in Scripture for that peculiar grace of which he spoke.

He made no reply to this, but merely added that he did not mean to say anything against marriage, for that he approved of it—that it was an institution of God, and that the Church held that it conferred a special grace, and that he therefore could not recommend, and would shrink from recommending any man to leave his wife, for he felt it ought not to be done, unless under very peculiar circumstances that seemed to imply a special call.

I felt that this was only a sort of reservation—that these “peculiar circumstances” and this “special call” opened a very wide door to men leaving their wives. The instance referred to at the commencement of his conversation, was an instance of this. However, I said nothing on the point, and wished to bring the subject to a conclusion—it was already sufficiently long—so I stated that I wished he would solve a difficulty that had long pressed on my mind, in reference to the doctrines of the Church of Rome on this subject.

I said that my difficulty arose from the apparent clashing of two doctrines of the Church of Rome on this subject. It was held by her that celibacy was a state of life more full of grace and holiness than marriage—that the unmarried are, as such, more holy than the married—that priests and monks and nuns are, in the very fact of their being vowed to an unmarried state, more holy and full of grace than those who are married. This principle I stated I could well understand, even though I could not believe or approve it. I could well understand it when considered alone and in itself, but I could not understand at all when considered in connection with another doctrine of the Church of Rome. That other doctrine was, that marriage was a sacrament, and that as such, marriage was a further means of grace, and brought an increase of grace to its recipients ; so that the married man as such received more grace, or an additional grace, than he had previously. It led to this—that the unmarried man was more holy and full of grace than the married, and yet by marrying he received more grace and holiness than before. And thus by one doctrine celibacy was more gracious and holy than marriage ; and by the other, marriage conferred a grace or holiness additional to that of celibacy ! I added, that though this seemed to my poor judgment a curious inconsistency and contradiction, yet it was possible he might be able to reconcile them ; and I then reminded him, that in the commencement of this conversation he had asserted the superior grace given in the Catholic Church to those who lived in celibacy, and that just now he asserted that there was an additional grace conferred by the sacrament of marriage. I was proceeding thus, when I perceived he either wished to avoid the subject, or at least was not listening to me. He seemed thinking of something else. I paused for a reply.

He answered as if he had never heard me, saying there was no certainty, no security for anything in the Church of England—that he could not understand how I could continue in a Church so full of doubts and uncertainty—in a Church in which all was doubtful and nothing certain—a Church whose doctrines depended on private judgment, and therefore depended on the changing judgment of every individual, and which therefore could give no real satisfaction or contentment to the mind that looked for certainty and stability. He then asked me in a very kind, gentle, and winning way, whether I did not feel my mind more inclined than before to repose itself far away from the doubtfulness of the Church of England, in the certainties of the Catholic Church—the Church of Rome.

I could not hide from myself that this was no more than an attempt to evade my enquiry as to the inconsistencies between his views of celibacy and marriage ; and I really wished to fasten the subject on him so as to force a reply on a point so interesting to me, but I felt that caution on my part was absolutely necessary, and I must do nothing that looked like a desire to obtain a triumph in argument : I feared the consequences from an Order all-powerful at Rome. And at the same time I must not hide the fact, that when his words suggested the point of the comparative certainty of the doctrines of the two Churches, I felt that it was a subject that was in no degree less interesting than that which I was thus forced to abandon, and that I might safely follow him.

I stated that I felt the doctrines of the Church of England were not doubtful, but certain, as being found in the infallible book—the Holy Scriptures—but that I could not regard the doctrines of the Church of Rome in any other light than both doubtful and uncertain—that such had long been my impression. I thought this would lead him to express himself more strongly.

He smiled at my words, and seemed pleased to have drawn me into a subject on which he felt confident he could overpower my arguments, and perhaps remove my scruples. He said, that the doctrines of the Catholic Church were founded on infallible truth, and were of course infallibly certain—that they were based on infallibility according to the promise of Christ to his Church—that they were not dependent on every man's private judgment or private interpretation, which led to innumerable doubts and uncertainties—and therefore he asked me what I had to say on that point. He appeared to be convinced of the unquestionable certainty of the whole system of the Church of Rome, and seemed with much confidence and animation to challenge opposition.

I said in return that many persons in England took a very different view of this subject—that they were men thoughtful, astute, and able, who thought that what we call common sense ought to be applied to everything, and who asserted that all the professed certainty of the Roman system had not a shadow to depend on, and was incomparably less certain than the grounds of belief held in the Church of England.

My friend laughed heartily at my statement, and asked me, with a show of confidence, to specify particulars. I was fully conscious of the truth that lay at the bottom of my position, but I had my fears that I might not be able to develope my argument as it seemed to me to deserve. Throughout these conversations I had the most unbounded confidence in the truth and power of my own principles, but I felt the most overpowering sense at times of my inability to state them as they deserved. An unseen power had, however, sustained me hitherto, and though with much timidity, I felt I ought not to distrust.

I said, with much carefulness, that there seemed to me that there was extreme uncertainty as to every doctrine of his Church. If it was the question of infallibility, there was uncertainty as to whether it was to be sought in a Council or in a Pope or in the Church generally. If it was the question of the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary, it was a matter of dispute in his own Church. If it was a question as to apostolic succession in the Priesthood, it was uncertain whether the officiating Bishops had an intention to ordain. If it was a question as to Transubstantiation, there were so many hindrances and defects that there was no subject in the world upon which, on their own showing, there was so much occasion for uncertainty.

He laughed good-humouredly and with a look of triumph. He seemed to feel I had not a shadow of pretence for my statement, and he said with the boldest confidence of manner that I was wrong—utterly wrong in supposing there could be any failure in the process of Transubstantiation. Whenever, he said emphatically, and with a look of surprise that I should ever have thought otherwise—whenever a priest pronounces the words, the effect is produced—the Transubstantiation takes place. He expressed his surprise I should have imagined otherwise.

I felt somewhat nettled by this. I did not like to be treated like a child,—expected to believe without question all that might be asserted, and I liked still less what seemed to me on the instant an attempt to deceive me—to presume on my ignorance and practise upon me.

I restrained myself, and said, that I ought to apologise if I was wrong, but that if it were an error, I had learned it from the Missal. I reminded him, that he of course was more intimate than I could pretend to be, with the Roman Missal—especially with those parts which detail the defects of consecration,—defects of which it is expressly stated, that they invalidate or rather prevent the consecration and transubstantiation of the elements. I added, that he knew there were, according to the Missal, certain defects in the bread, and in the wine, in the dress of the Priest, and even in the state of his mind and health, some of which were stated to invalidate the consecration of the elements, so as that there could be no sacrament, and therefore no transubstantiation, and no mass.

He again said, with the greatest confidence, that I was altogether mistaken—that there was nothing of the kind that I had stated,—and he expressed his surprise I should be under such a mistaken impression. He spoke with a confidence of manner that almost shook me, and after a moment's reflection, I thought that if he was practising a deception on me, presuming on my ignorance, he deserved a fearless exposure, and that if he was really himself ignorant and deceived, he ought to be enlightened by a plain statement of the truth.

I called his attention to the Missale Romanum. In its rubrical and introductory parts it sets forth a series of defects. Its very title is—De defectibus. In one place it sets forth the defects of matter,—in another, the defects of manner. In one it states that no consecration takes place,—in another it asserts that no transubstantiation is effected. There is now a defect in the wine, and now a defect in the bread, and now again a defect in the Priest. And while each, or all these defects are said to prevent the consecration from taking effect,—while they thus prevent any transubstantiation being effected, they yet are of such a nature that the people, the worshippers know, and can know, nothing about them. And yet, I added, you let the people fall down and adore that host which your Missal allows is not consecrated.

He said that I was quite mistaken—that the moment the Priest pronounced the words enim hoc est corpus meum the transubstantiation was effected, and that I ought not to imagine anything else,—that I was certainly mistaken. All Theologians were unanimous on the point.

I replied that it was not I, but the Roman Missal was mistaken in that case. I felt somewhat provoked at his coolness and boldness, and I was resolved to bring him down, so I called his attention to the Missal; at the same time taking care to express myself so as to avoid giving offence. I said that we were well acquainted with the Missal in England—that the clergy of England were intimate with all these rubrical statements—that they always argued from them that there was no certainty of anything in the Church of Rome. I added, that perhaps he was not aware of the precise nature of their argument on this point, and I would therefore with his permission endeavour to state it.

I then reminded him that in the Missal there was a detail of those things which were “Defects occurring in the celebration of the Mass.” Such is the title under which they are detailed. And those defects are detailed which may be found in the bread and wine—some being found in the form or manner of consecration—some being in the absence of a right intention on the part of the minister, as where he perhaps thinks there are only ten hosts, when there are really eleven—some being connected with the religious state of his soul, as to whether he is in mortal sin—some being dependent on his bodily health [as in ix. 5.]—in short, defects many and various, and yet if some of them occur, the consecration, and transubstantiation, and sacrifice, do not take place; “non conficitur sacramentum” is the language of the Missal. Now the argument, I added, so frequently used in England, is, that if the consecration, and consequent transubstantiation and sacrifice, are dependent on these things—if they are so dependent, as that there is no sacrament, no transubstantiation, no mass, unless these particulars are strictly correct, then the people can never be sure of anything—can never know whether the bread and wine be rubrical, whether the priest has the right intention, whether there be or be not one more host than contemplated, whether he is in mortal sin, whether he is fasting, and therefore the people can never know whether there be a real consecration, whether there be a real transubstantiation, or a real sacrifice, even on their own principles. I added that this was a common argument in England, shewing that the sacrament was uncertain—that therefore the transubstantiation was uncertain, and consequently the worship and adoration of the host a most dangerous thing—that the sacrifice of the mass was uncertain, and therefore all the money expended on masses for the dead, were uncertainly applied—in short, wherever we turned we were met with uncertainties; and the very last Church in Christendom that ought to speak of the uncertain nature of any Church, was the Church of Rome, which was herself the most uncertain of all Churches.

My friend listened coolly and calmly to all this. I had never observed him more collected, and he answered me by stating explicitly that I was altogether under a mistake—that all I had stated was a mistake—that whenever the priest pronounced the words, “Hoc est enim corpus meum,” the change was effected—that there was no doubt whatever of the transubstantiation taking place—that this was a point ruled universally among them, and then he added, in the tone of a master, that he was surprised at my thinking of such an objection.

I replied that I had stated the argument commonly used in England. I was bound to say that I felt they had very good ground for so arguing—that whether he could answer the argument, remained to be seen—that they opened the Missale Romanum, and read there these rubrical statements as to the defects of matter, manner, and person, which prevented the effects of consecration—that as all this was patent at the very beginning of the Missal, it could scarcely be expected that the clergy of England would be satisfied with a bare denial of a matter which they themselves could read and understand without the least difficulty. I therefore asked him whether he could kindly give me any explanation of these acknowledged defects, and shew that everything was certain, where these rubrics seemed to make them the most uncertain things in the world.

He again merely expressed his surprise how I could dwell on such an objection, as there was no ground whatever for my entertaining it.

I replied, by saying, I feared that I had not made myself understood. In the Roman Missal it is expressly stated, that “Defects sometimes occur on the part of the matter to be consecrated,—on the part of the form in which it is done, and on the part of the officiating minister. Whatever of these is defective, namely, the due matter, the form with intention, and the sacerdotal order in the officiating person, the sacrament is not celebrated—non conficitur sacramentum.” If there be some defect in the kind of bread, “non conficitur sacramentum,”—if the wine have some specified defect, “non conficitur sacramentum.” If the priest goes through all the form and appearance of consecrating, and yet does not intend to consecrate, that is, if he has no intention, actual or virtual, then “in these cases there is no consecration, because intention is requisite”—“in his casibus non consecrat, quia requiritur intentio.” Here is a series of defects of various kinds, and where they are found, there is no real sacrament.* There may be the shew, the form, the appearance of sacraments, sacrifices, masses, and transubstantiation—there may be all this in appearance, and yet no reality, owing to a defect of intention on the part of the priest, or some other defect of which the worshippers and communicants neither know nor can know anything. They may believe, but they never can be certain, and this is the objection to the system, that while it professes to be the most certain, it is really the least certain of all.

He gave me no explanation of all this, but replied, as before, that it was all a mistake—that whenever the Priest pronounced the words of consecration, the change or transubstantiation was certainly effected.

I felt that I could make nothing of this line of argument, as he met me with only this one answer; so I said, that at all events it was very uncertain whether Infallibility resided in a Council or a Pope, as there was no decision on the subject,—that it was very uncertain that the departed persons who were invoked as saints, were really saints in glory, as there was no authority but the Pope's having said so—that it was very uncertain that they heard or could hear the prayers offered to them in all parts of the world at the same time by so many votaries—that it was very uncertain whether they had true orders among them, as intention was requisite in conferring them, and none could answer for the secret intentions of others,—in short, I said, so far as positive certainty is concerned, the very last Church that ought to make such a ground of exception against another, is the Church of Rome.

He still said I was labouring under a great mistake. There was no Church in the world more sure and certain than the Catholic Church. It was founded on the Rock of St. Peter by Christ himself. Infallibility and Perpetuity were promised to it, and while other Churches rise to-day, and fall to-morrow, this Catholic Church alone has survived every shock of every wave of time. Among all the Churches of the world she alone is certain.

I felt that there was no use on that occasion to attempt a continuance of the argument. The conversation turned for a moment to the supposed uncertainty of the Protestant system of referring all things to the Scriptures, and then passed away to other topics, and soon ended.

The question as to the Protestant system of referring all things to the Holy Scriptures is a question of the deepest interest, and was not entered on at that conversation as it deserved. It was only touched on incidentally, as one subject was giving way to another. But the real point of this subtle yet most important of all questions, was the subject of a short but interesting conversation with the Professor of Dogmatic Theology. I will transcribe here my notes of what was said on both sides.

The Professor stated, that we often misunderstood the rule of faith in the Church of Rome. It was not as was supposed, Scripture and Tradition, but was simply the revelation or word of God. That revelation or word of God was transmitted to the Church, partly in the Scriptures, and partly in Tradition. But, in the Anglican Church, he added, the rule of faith was the Scriptures alone, and not only that, but the Scriptures as interpreted by every man's own reason, in fact, by private interpretation.

I said, in reply, that he seemed to me to have quite mistaken the rule of faith in the Church of England. She did not hold, or state in any of her articles, that the Scriptures alone were her rule of faith, but that "the Holy Scriptures contain all things necessary to salvation." She does not deny that there may be many things, many good things, many true things, many profitable things, not contained in the Sacred Volume; but she holds that all such things, such extra-scriptural things, are not necessary to salvation. They may be very good, and true, and profitable, but they are not necessary to be believed in order to salvation. A man can be saved without them. He will find enough for his salvation in the Holy Scriptures, and we hold that nothing more should be enforced on him as necessary to salvation.

My friend did not contradict this. On the other hand, he acquiesced in my statement, but he said, that the great evil of the Protestant system was, that it accorded to every man the right to interpret Scripture for himself according to his own private judgment, telling them that that private interpretation was to be their rule of faith.

I stated, in reply, that my friend was quite mistaken,—that the Church of England gave no such opinion or judgment. Our rule of faith, I said, in all things necessary to salvation, was, the Holy Scriptures as interpreted by the Holy Ghost—not as interpreted by individuals themselves, but as interpreted by the Holy Ghost. And she gives the Holy Scriptures with an injunction to pray for the Holy Spirit. “Blessed Lord, who hast caused all Holy Scripture to be written for our learning, grant that we may so hear them, read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest them, that by patience and comfort of thy holy word, we may be enabled to embrace and ever hold fast the blessed hope of everlasting life, which thou hast given us in thy Son our Saviour Jesus Christ.” Such, I said, is her language and her feeling. Her rule of faith is, the Holy Scriptures as interpreted by the Holy Spirit,—not, as he seemed to suppose, as interpreted by every individual.

He said, that he had always understood, that the great principle of the Protestants was, the private or individual interpretation of the Scriptures, and that consequently the rule of faith of any individual, was the private interpretation of that individual. And that, therefore, the rules of faith were as numerous and as varying as the judgment of the individuals.

I could not but smile at this, and I said, that the real difference between the two Churches was this:—

The Church of England holds, that the faithful man in reading the Scriptures is to pray for the Holy Ghost for light and teaching; that, as his own natural sense and reason cannot learn the mind of God, so he may have the light and teaching of the Holy Ghost; that is, the interpretation of the Holy Ghost.

The Church of Rome holds, that the man is to look to the Church for the right interpretation of the word, and that by submitting to the teaching of the Church, he will learn from her the interpretation of the Holy Ghost.

And thus, I said, neither Church holds the private or individual interpretation to be the rule of faith—but that in every case it is the interpretation of the Holy Ghost. The real difference between them is, that the Romanist expects to learn it mediately through the Church, while the Protestant looks for it directly, in answer to the prayer of faith to the Holy Ghost.

My friend clearly saw this, and in a thoughtful way expressed his acquiescence in my statement. He repeated my distinction, and said that I was right, for that the real point of difference between the Churches was not on the question of private interpretation, but whether the true interpretation of the Word or Revelation of God was to be expected mediately through the Church, or directly in answer to the prayer of the faithful man. He said candidly that this was the real point of difference, but he made no objection whatever to the one, nor any argument in favour of the other. He seemed to speak thoughtfully.

I therefore took occasion to say that this view cut away and cast aside all the common arguments and objections to the reading of the Scriptures—to the right of every Christian individually, to read and examine and endeavour to understand and interpret the Scriptures. All this was put aside, as neither the one Church nor the other claimed as a rule of faith, anything but the word of God as interpreted through the teaching of the Holy Ghost. I did not see how he could object to our Protestant principle. We claimed nothing for the individual but the promise of God, that the Holy Ghost should enlighten and teach all sincere believers. We tell the individual to seek in prayer the teaching of the Holy Spirit, and to judge according to it.

He was too clear-sighted not to perceive that his objections were set aside by this view of the subject. He intimated that he thought it reasonable, but he said that a Church ought, under such circumstances as Christians are placed in, to provide for them such a system of interpretation of Holy Scripture as might enable them, as with a guide, to understand and interpret them aright. And that as the Church of England had failed in this—as indeed she had never attempted or pretended to supply such an interpretation, she had undoubtedly failed in her manifest duty towards her children, who were thus in danger of acting on their own interpretation. The Scriptures were given to them, but no authorized interpretation was given with them.

I could not but reflect, on this, as on many other occasions, how prone my friends at Rome were to urge, as fatal, arguments against the Church of England, which were as applicable, and often more applicable to the Church of Rome. So I said that if the Church of England had given no authorized interpretation of the Holy Scriptures, neither had the Church of Rome done so. If it was an omission in one, it was no less an omission in the other. The Church of Rome had never given any interpretation.

This retort led to some sallies of pleasantry, that prevented our conversation becoming embittered by a spirit of controversy, as we felt we could speak freely without giving or taking offence. And I am bound in all Christian candor to say that nothing could surpass the gentle and courteous bearing of my friendly opponent. This argument, however, did not proceed farther. My friend saw, and could not fail to see that he could urge no objection to the Church of England as touching the use and interpretation of the Holy Scriptures, that was not fully as cogent against the Church of Rome. One Church fully committed the sacred volume to the hands of her members, reminding them that they could profit by its perusal only by seeking in earnest and faithful prayer the teaching of the Holy Spirit, while the other Church cautiously, and, as if suspiciously, discouraged the general study of the Holy Scriptures, lest her members should be led to depend on them and their teaching, and thus so far withdraw from the teaching of the Church.

A suggestion was thrown out that the Scriptures ought to be interpreted according to the interpretation of the ancient Fathers, and that this would counteract the evils of private judgment, and tend to keep men's minds with the Church.

I replied by saying that the suggestion was one I had frequently thought of, but that it appeared still more objectionable ; that is, liable still more to the very objection made against the practice of Protestants. As far as I understood the common objection, it was to the system of individuals exercising their private judgment on the sacred volume. Whereas this suggestion proposed the system of exercising their private judgment on the writings of the Fathers who wrote on the sacred volume. There was thus the very same system of private judgment in both cases ; the only difference being that the Protestant exercised his judgment on the Scriptures directly, while the Romanist exercised his judgment mediately through the ancient Fathers on the same Scriptures. I thought men were safer in going at once to the fountain-head.

The conversation ended with expressions of mutual good feeling, which were as kindly expressed on both sides as they were sincerely felt.

CHAPTER XI.

THE ORIGIN OF THE CATACOMBS—THE CHRISTIANS USING THEM AS A REFUGE—AS A PLACE OF WORSHIP—AS A BURIAL-PLACE—FORGOTTEN AND AFTERWARDS DISCOVERED—RESORTED TO FOR RELICS—A VISIT TO THEM—DESCRIPTION OF THEIR PRESENT STATE—MEANS OR TESTS FOR THE DISCOVERY OF RELICS—COLLECTION OF MONUMENTAL INSCRIPTIONS FOUND IN THE CATACOMBS—THEIR CHARACTER AND NATURE—A CONVERSATION IN THE COLLEGE OF THE JESUITS RESPECTING THEM—CONCLUSION AS TO THE RELIGION OF THE PRIMITIVE CHURCH.

DURING a visit at the Collegio Romano, a conversation arose in reference to the Catacombs, and the argument to be derived from their inscriptions. Some remarks respecting the Catacombs will be necessary to render the conversation intelligible.

The origin of the Catacombs was in the days of pagan Rome, and long previous to the preaching of Christianity. They seem now universally regarded as the mines or quarries, from which the inhabitants of Rome extracted those vast supplies of that kind of earth or sand called puzzolana, so generally used in their buildings. Quarrying in the Campagna for this, they carried their shafts sometimes to a considerable depth, and on striking on a vein they followed its windings, sometimes upwards, sometimes downwards, now by long flights of steps, and then by winding galleries. The branches from the main shafts or galleries extend in every direction, frequently so winding as to intersect each other, debouching by a great variety of openings on the Campagna. These passages are narrow, ranging generally from three to six feet in width, and from seven to ten in height. They are very rude and rough and rugged, presenting in themselves, apart from the associations which give them so deep an interest, nothing whatever beyond the shafts, galleries, or passages of any mine. They are cold, damp and dark, and constitute a sort of gigantic honeycomb-work, extending for miles in different directions underground; and many a time the wanderer of the Campagna—the desolate Campagna—comes suddenly upon some deep hole—some dark hollow, which if explored will be found to be one of the innumerable entrances to these quarries, or at least one of those spots where the superincumbent soil has sunk in, and perhaps closed some branch of the Catacombs for ever. Indeed this sudden falling in of the earth after heavy rains, severe frosts, and occasional tremblings of an earthquake, has been a source of much danger. Tales are frequently narrated of scenes too horrible to describe here, of those who heedlessly and without competent guides, have entered these subterranean regions. The earth falling in has crushed or smothered some, while it has debarred for ever all exit for others, who have been left there to perish miserably. They who thus sought the Catacombs as the grave-place of others, found them only a grave for themselves.

to be worked by the Romans. They seem to have been exhausted, at all events they had been long closed as mines, before those events of Christian history, which were destined to shroud the Catacombs with an ineffaceable interest and charm.

It is unnecessary to notice the persecutions of the primitive Church. The everlasting hatred—the frantic fury—the deep malignity—the atrocious cruelty, so truly representing man as half-beast and half-fiend, that so characterized these several persecutions, are matters of history now familiar to all classes of Christians. They are alluded to here only as the causes, which first operated in investing the Catacombs with their special and peculiar interest. It was in these Catacombs the Christians concealed themselves from the horrors of their persecutors. Some Christians, feeling themselves called on to stand as witnesses for the truth, gave their testimony with faithfulness and fearlessness, and willingly and rejoicingly sealed their testimony with their blood. They received the martyr's grave and the martyr's crown. Others seem to have sought their martyrdom—to have rushed madly to the tribunals, accused themselves and sought the crown of martyrdom as they might seek the robe of marriage. It is not necessary either to justify or impugn the motives of these persons, who seem to have freely sought persecution rather than to have been sought by it. But the immense body of the faithful, feeling no such special vocation to martyrdom—feeling confident that they would be enabled to stand faithful if called on in the hour of need—rather fled before their enemies and sought to retire from view, and hide themselves till the storm was overpast. They fled in vast numbers and concealed themselves in the Catacombs. As the profession of Christianity became a capital offence, it became necessary for all to fly for their lives—to fly from home, kindred, property, all, and conceal themselves until some change in the law or some mitigation in the persecution might give them some hope of escape. In the meantime family after family, as well as individual after individual, fled from the city of Rome into the Campagna ; and there entering the holes and shafts of the Catacombs, concealed themselves in the dark recesses and winding passages and gloomy labyrinths of those exhausted and neglected mines. We read of some of the saints of the Old Testament, that “they wandered about in sheepskins and goatskins, being destitute, afflicted, tormented, of whom the world was not worthy ; they wandered in deserts and in mountains, and in dens and caves of the earth.” And these had their followers in the saints of the New Testament. They gathered in crowds into these dark caverns. They flitted among them like spectres, startling and frightening each other, as meeting suddenly in these graves of the living ; now shrinking in terror as from an approaching enemy, and now meeting with joyous thankfulness some faithful friend. There must have been a powerful bond of brotherhood created by scenes like these, by a consciousness of common dangers and mutual dependence, and by the fact that they all were the sufferers for the same high and holy cause ; and were all knit together by the strongest ties of Christian brotherhood ; and they lived together encouraging and comforting one another by that with which they themselves were comforted of God, by the enduring, ennobling hope of eternal life.

This conversion of the Catacombs into places of refuge, and concealment for the miserable and persecuted Christians, led to their consecration to a yet higher and holier purpose. It led naturally to their becoming the place for Christian worship. It has been ever found in the experience of Christianity, that affliction and sorrow draw the heart from the things of this present world ; and that times like those to which we are now referring—times when no man could call his life his own, draw men powerfully to their knees, and lead to a more frequent, more earnest, more fervent attendance and devotion to the worship of God. Such times lead true and faithful men not only to more devotion in private for personal comfort and strength, but also to more united worship, for mutual encouragement and support. Accordingly, amidst the deep afflictions and fearful sufferings of these victims of persecution, they assembled together for the worship of God. They there knelt and prayed and praised and read together. And those long passages and dreary caverns resounded with the words of prayer, and with the hymn of praise, and with the reading of the word, and with the preaching of the gospel, as these faithful and devout men, the children of persecuted Christianity, and living martyrs to the faith of Jesus, poured out their souls in prayer and praise. There they excavated little recesses and called them Churches, where they could assemble in larger numbers for the common worship of God, and the communion of the Lord's Supper. And there many a hardened heart was melted into love, and many a broken spirit was healed by the balm of Gilead, and many an afflicted soul was comforted of God. There must have been an inexpress-sible charm in the words of Holy Scripture under such touching circumstances, and there must have been a marvellous power in the gospel preached faithfully in such strange scenes and stranger times. Nor was this all. Even when persecution relaxed in violence, and Christians were not necessarily exposed to death for their profession ; and when therefore they were enabled to steal forth from these dark caves and return to home and relatives, still there was no relaxation of violence against any thing approaching to a public celebration of Christian worship. It was necessary therefore to conduct it with the strictest secrecy—a secrecy so strict as to be unknown to all but those whose faithfulness could be entirely depended on ; and it was thence invested intentionally with a veil of mystery, so as to ensure its being kept secret from the uninitiated. This secrecy became the more necessary, when discovery would have been the certain martyrdom of the most zealous and devoted of the ministry of the Church. All this led to the worship of the Christians being secretly and mysteriously celebrated in the Catacombs. And those Christians who, living in the upper world, breathing the air and enjoying the light of heaven, yet loved to join in the common service, and in the holy communion, were obliged to resort in the silent hours of night to those holes in the Campagna, which led through many a long and winding intricacy, to the secret recesses where they could enjoy the ministrations of the Church.

And further still, these dark and dreary scenes, were destined to become a yet higher source of interest. The Christians who fled there and found safety there, were not unmindful of their brethren, who in the upper world were called to the trials of martyrdom ; who not escaping as others, or perhaps arrested in the moment of escaping, were doomed to the sword, or to the scaffold, or to the wild beasts of the Colosseum. They used to steal from their hiding-places by night, and bear away the mangled bodies and scattered bones of these martyred men, and bringing them among their brethren, thank God for the faithfulness of their testimony, pray to God to be enabled to follow the example of patience and faith, and then bury them in the recesses of the Catacombs. The Catacombs thus become the graves of the martyrs. Too soon and too often, alas, they became the scenes of martyrdom. On some occasions when the fury of persecution raged with more than ordinary malignancy, the persecutors would enter the Catacombs and slay the unhappy Christians even in their hiding-places ; and though in the intricacy of these deep recesses, the unhappy ones were able easily to stop passages and remain only in those places where none but those well acquainted with the place could possibly trace them, yet at times they were treacherously betrayed and surprised, so as that the Catacombs became not only the graves of martyrs but the scenes of martyrdom ; and besides this, the Christians usually buried their dead in these places. The pagan Romans, at least of the higher and wealthier classes, usually burned their dead, and deposited the ashes in small cinerary urns or vessels. The Christian Romans on the other hand, seem invariably to have adopted the practice of burying their dead, perhaps from the Jewish custom or from the prevalent opinion that the end of the world was at hand, and that their bodies would soon arise again for immortality. At all events, whatever was the motive, the practice was universal. They made no burial-places above ground, but taking the reliques of the dead into the recesses of the Catacombs, where so many of the slaves and poorer classes of the heathens were buried, they there deposited their brethren. They cut a cavity in the side-wall, so to speak, of the passage or gallery, sufficiently large to contain the body, and there they laid it. This system continued for years, even for centuries; and as the number of Christians multiplied at Rome, so the number of burials multiplied in proportion; till all through the Catacombs, the walls of the passages and galleries on both sides were full of these graves, arranged sometimes two and three deep, so that the stranger now walking through the Catacombs is walking through long galleries of the dead, sleeping on either hand in numbers beyond counting. There lie buried the mangled forms of the most faithful of martyrs, men who counted not their lives dear to themselves—there lie buried the bones of many an afflicted and persecuted saint, who lived and died in the hope of glory—there rest the mortal remains of many a faithful Christian, whose life adorned the gospel he professed, and commended it to the admiration of all men; and there lie the mouldering bodies of ten thousand times ten thousand of those men, who have professed the name of Christian, but whose hearts are known only to Him, who shall reveal all secrets at the judgment-day.

Such is the interest associated with the Catacombs. It is purely the interest of association, as in themselves they possess nothing of attraction even to the curious. But associated as they are with the persecutions of the primitive church, consecrated by being the place where the sacred services were celebrated, and hallowed as the resting-place of so many Christians, they possess an enduring charm to the Christian.

And yet it seems strange that they should have been so long neglected and forgotten. It is certain that soon after Christianity had triumphed over Paganism, and had become the established religion of the empire, the Catacombs ceased to be resorted to as the sacred and cherished burial-place of the Christian dead. They were closed. From being unused, they soon became neglected ; and from being neglected, they soon became forgotten. It is a remarkable fact, that for many centuries the memory of the Catacombs was forgotten, and even their existence totally unknown. For ages all tradition of their uses—their sacredness—their monstrosity—contents—and even of their very existence, was utterly lost. In the city of Rome, with all its crowding memories, this was lost. In the Church of Rome with all its supposed congeniality with antiquity—with all its boasted veneration and devotion to the ancient—with all its priests and its monks, its convents and its monasteries—in the Church of Rome, all memory of the Catacombs, as the refuge of the persecuted Christian—as the place of the services of the persecuted Church—as the burial-place of the martyrs and the saints of Christ, was as thoroughly lost and as perfectly a forgotten and neglected thing, as in the Mosques of Mecca. It was not till the sixteenth century, that the evidence of their existence and their uses called attention to them ; and the interest and importance of the subject were forced upon the lazy and slumbering inmates of the innumerable convents of Rome.

And even then they were destined to be desecrated by a use that could scarcely have been anticipated. They were invaded by innumerable bands of monks and friars, collecting from their graves the bones of the long-buried dead ; —disturbing the mouldering relics of mortality—dragging them into the upper world—hawking them from city to city, and from country to country ; and driving an execrable traffic in them under the name of relics. Every grave was rifled, every skeleton was rent asunder, every bone was pounded in order to multiply splinters ; and when once the grave of some martyr or saint was said to be discovered, the head was severed and sent to one country, and the leg was severed and sent to another, an arm was forwarded to one land and a thigh to another, a tooth was extracted from the skull and sent to some convent, and a rib severed from the back sent to some monastery. And at the same time a traffic of the most disgraceful and degrading nature was driven in all these, as lawful articles of ecclesiastical merchandize. The demand for such articles was so great, in the superstition and ignorance of the times, and the miraculous properties of such relics were so extravagantly extolled, as of incalculable advantage to the temporal and spiritual interest of the possessors, that the demand of the market soon called forth an adequate supply ; and such was the unscrupulousness of the authorities at Rome, and so utterly profligate the monks who were the merchants in this matter, that they not unfrequently sold several different skulls as the only true skull of some particular martyr, and several different arms as the veritable arms of some favorite saint, so that even at the present day, some saints have several different heads and arms in different places. Sometimes the traveller in Italy discovers some martyr who has had two or three heads, and some saint who has had four or five arms, and perhaps a still greater superfluity of legs. The enormous amount of wealth which this traffic brought into Rome is incalculable. The Catacombs are a mine of bones, and have proved incomparably more precious than if they had been a mine of silver.

But disgusting and sickening as was all this, as an indecency and an outrage upon the dead, and revolting as it was to every gentle and Christian feeling, it yet could not alter the facts of past history, nor strip the Catacombs of their touching interest and real importance to the student of Christian history. There the Catacombs remained, there the graves of the Christians remained, there the monuments of the dead remained ; and while these remained it might be hoped that they would supply some evidences—some items of primitive customs and primitive opinions, that might serve to illustrate the opinions and the practices of primitive Christianity.

The best mode of visiting these scenes, at least those Catacombs most generally, because most easily, visited and explored, is by entering them through the Church of the convent of St. Sebastian. It is narrated in the legend of that saint, that he was a young and handsome soldier—that for the crime of believing in Christianity, he was bound to a tree as a target for the arrows of his comrades—that having been shot through every limb till he bristled with arrows, a human porcupine, he yet survived by a miracle—that he again accused himself before the tribunals, and was dispatched by decapitation. This, or something of this kind, is the legend of St. Sebastian, one of the most favored and popular of the saints at Rome ; not so much from anything extraordinary in the saint himself, as from his being so useful and fine a subject for the pencils of the artists. The fine and youthful figure—the fleshiness and nakedness—the grace of the position, and the expression of the face, all supply a noble subject for the artist ; and the multiplication of the pictures creates a multiplication of votaries. It is said by the monks of the convent of St. Sebastian, that their Church or Chapel is built over that part of the Catacomb where the body of the saint was buried. This is by no means improbable ; at all events there is an entrance—and it is by far the best and most convenient—into the Catacombs through the Church of the convent.

The monk who acted as guide or cicerone, on our visit to these interesting scenes, was selected for his office with admirable judgment, and as admirable taste. He looked like a moving plague—a personification of the malaria—a walking pestilence. There he was, an attenuated thing, a living skeleton, with his brown cloak around him to conceal the bones from view ; you might fancy you could almost see the light of the candles shining through his ribs ; and withal he looked a meek and subdued man, one who spoke with vivacity—indeed with enthusiasm, though his voice was toned with a sad and melancholy cadence. He was very calm, thoughtful and silent, if left to himself, but exceedingly animated and communicative when questioned. He spoke in raptures of the subterranean Chapel, and gave all real and needful information, as well as a good deal that was unreal, respecting the Catacombs, that the general visitor could require. He supplied each of our party with a lighted candle. He led the way himself with steps slow and solemn, and as stealthily as if he feared to disturb the slumbers of the dead. On he moved, or rather glided, through those dark passages and damp galleries, looking for all the world like a ghost; and but for the color of his brown monkish dress, with his thin, haggard, attenuated look; and at the same time his earnest and impressive manner, he might well have passed for one of the ancient inhabitants of the Catacombs called again to life. He would stop at times, and carefully explain all the details of some grave more remarkable than the rest, and at other times he would pause, hold his candle in one hand, and mysteriously point with his other bony hand to some spot or object—look unutterably mysterious, and then drop his eyes to the ground and pass on without another word. And then, when all was over, he looked so poor and sad—so miserable and meek, and stood so modestly looking for the gratuity usually given on those occasions, with an expression that seemed designed to move the visitor to more than ordinary liberality; that there really was no resisting the incomparable acting of his silent begging. Poor man! He earns hardly the money he receives.

The graves of the Catacombs are excavated on both sides of these passages. They are excavated in the soil or tufo, which forms the sides of the passages, and therefore can be examined with the greatest possible facility. They are often smaller—much smaller than might be expected, indeed so very small sometimes, as to raise the question as to the manner in which the bodies of the dead could have found room in them.

That these graves, at least for the greater portion, were the graves of Christians, is very generally believed. The grounds of that belief are not so certain as might be desirable. It was certainly the custom of the Pagan Romans to burn their dead. But this was true generally and not universally; for it was customary to bury the slaves and the poorer classes; and there is not a shadow of doubt as to the Catacombs having been frequently used as the burial-place of those classes of the heathen population, long before their being made the refuge of the persecuted Christians. And besides this there is every probability that the Christians often buried the bodies of their heathen relatives, among those of other Christian members of the same family. The bones of many who had continued in heathenism, were laid in affectionate remembrance beside those of others, near and loved, who had embraced Christianity. And thus heathen and Christian sleep side by side, in the last and common resting-place of humanity.

This fact has been placed beyond a shadow of doubt, by the number of monumental inscriptions, which are certainly heathen, found in the Catacombs. Nor is it a sufficient answer to this, to suggest that possibly they may have taken the monumental tablets of heathens, and employed them to cover the graves of Christians, as this would only prove that there were the tombs of heathens close at hand; indeed this seems very certain, for some stones have heathen inscriptions on one side, and Christian inscriptions on the other, shewing that they had taken a heathen stone, and reversing it, placed it on a Christian grave, and then wrote a suitable inscription.

It was almost universal among the Pagan Romans, to place over the monumental inscription the words “Divis Manibus,” which they sometimes contracted to the two first letters, “ D. M.”—the allusion being to the gods presiding over the place of the dead. This and other allusions to their gods, occur frequently on the monumental tablets of the Catacombs, thus demonstrating the fact of the burial of heathens in those places.

The non-observance of this has led to some ludicrous mistakes, even to the enrolling some heathens in the roll of saints, and the worship of the bones of heathens as the reliques of saints. The following is a well-known instance of this.

D. M.

Julia Evodia filia fecit castae matri.

This is a heathen inscription. The tablet is dedicated to the Manes, “ Divis Manibus,” and is similar to thousands of others found on the graves and urns of heathens. It is a memento which Julia Evodia, a daughter, raised to her mother. And without ever considering that the lady was a heathen, the monks have disposed of her bones as the reliques of a saint and martyr; and never observing that it was the grave of the mother, whose name is not given, they have christened the bones by the name of the daughter, as the reliques of Saint Julia Evodia, who had erected the tablet !

This is a well-known and amusing instance of the mistakes into which either their ignorance or their avarice seduced the clergy of Rome in former days. They now indeed exhibit some ingenuity in suggesting that the D. M. of the heathen monuments may possibly have been adopted among some Christians, to express Deo Maximo or perhaps Divus Martyr, and thus endeavour to Christianize all those monuments of the heathens found in the Catacombs ! The enlightened and candid among them laugh at the whole affair as much as ourselves ; and this they can do the more easily, as all that could have been gained by the mistakes or deceptions of the old monks, has long since been accomplished.

On asking our emaciated and ghastly guide for the signs by which he could ascertain the grave of a Christian from that of a heathen, he replied by pointing to little crosses scratched on the wall beside or above the graves. He pronounced these to be the signs of the Christian faith of the departed dead. This seemed reasonable, but it occurred at the moment that, as these Catacombs were in the possession of these monks for some centuries, so they could scratch these crosses over any number of graves that might seem desirable. It was clear they could never be detected, and the character of monks has never been such, as to secure them from all suspicion of “pious frauds.” This appeared still more probable, when, having lingered a little behind our party, in order to examine some grave more accurately, I observed a gentleman occupying himself the mean time, in making these crosses with the iron end of his walking-stick ! We agreed that there was no appearance of difference between these and the other crosses ; and so our young friend amused himself with making a few more, and when we left the Catacombs he congratulated himself on having made half a dozen saints or Christians at least during his visit !

I was particularly anxious to learn the means, by which the monks were able to ascertain the bones of a saint—the bones of a martyr—from the bones of any ordinary Christian. As the Catacombs were the great treasure-house of relics, I wished to learn the tests or signs by which those bones, which were to be venerated as relics of saints, were to be discerned from the bones of others. While residing far away in the distant scenes of England, a man is compelled to rest satisfied with what information he can gather from books on such subjects; and there is scarcely a strong statement that can be made by one party, that is not immediately contradicted by the other; so that the mind of an enquirer is held in suspense, amidst the hardihood of assertion generated by the odium theologicum,—that compound of the gall and vinegar of Calvary. But I have sometimes thought that there would be a satisfaction in making the enquiry and receiving the answer on the spot. I resolved therefore to ask the question, amidst the dark vaults and dreary graves of the Catacombs, and to obtain my answer amidst the fleshless skeletons and long-silent bones of the primitive Christians.

The poor attenuated skeleton of a monk, who seemed to me as pious as he was poor, and as sincere as he was attenuated, stated that one sign was a red mark, which was sometimes observed beside a grave. This, he said, was the blood of the martyr, which was thus sprinkled on this spot, in order to remain as a sign of martyrdom. Another sign was a small bottle, which was found in many graves, but not in all. This bottle was found to contain some deposit of a reddish hue, which it had been inferred was blood—the blood of the person there buried, and who therefore must have died the death of a martyr. It at once suggested itself, that it was an easy matter for the monks to multiply the number of these things, whenever they were in need of a new supply of reliques for the market, as they had only to place a red mark upon any grave, or deposit one of these little bottles of terra cotta beside it. I felt that at least I could have no great dependence on them, even supposing the signs to be real and not fictitious, for there is no authority—no ground whatever—not the shadow of authority or ground for supposing, that either the red spot or the bottle are signs of martyrdom or saintship, any more than of that Christianity which holds salvation by the blood of the cross. If they are signs of anything in particular, they seem rather the sign of men who died depending on the blood of Christ ; and whose surviving friends gave to their graves that sign of their faith. The truth is, no dependence whatever can be placed on these signs, and I afterwards found that they were laughed at, by the more learned clergy of Rome.

Our interesting but most credulous guide, seemed fully to believe what he was stating ; and when I enquired as to the signs or tests of a saint—the means by which the bones of a saint—not a martyr, but a saint—might be discerned from those of ordinary Christians, he replied with the most perfect simplicity, that when they were first discovered they emitted a sweet odour—a delicious fragrance that ravished the senses ; and as this certainly was not the ordinary property of dead men's bones, it seemed to argue—if true—something most marvellous and saintly. But this was not all. When these bones were brought forth into the upper world, they wrought the most wonderful miracles, the sick were healed, the dead were raised, the heretics were converted at the touch or sight of these bones, thus demonstrated to be the reliques of some saint. There is one instance on record. It was the case of a skull, a fleshless, eyeless, tongueless, noseless skull. It was questioned, after certain exorcisms, as to the rightful owner, and it answered its name, its residence, and told the circumstances under which its owner was decapitated, dying a martyr's death! What other persons may think of such marvellous doings—such exquisite perfumes from bones, and such interesting colloquies with skulls—it is not for me to say or determine. The poor monk, who guided us through these dreary Catacombs, seemed religiously to believe them, and he was not singular in doing so. The enlightened portion of the ecclesiastical body, however, are quite as unbelieving as Protestants on these particulars.

It was not possible that a source of evidence, so calculated to illustrate and prove the character of primitive Christianity, as the inscriptions in the Catacombs, should fail to attract universal attention. It was fortunate for me that I had paid much and close attention to the great mass of such inscriptions, collected from the Catacombs, and deposited with admirable arrangement in the Vatican, as otherwise I should have been taken by surprise, and have been wholly unable to deal with the arguments of my friends the Jesuits, derived from those inscriptions. I was one day in the Collegio Romano, in company with the Librarian, the professor of Antiquities, or Archæology, the professor of Dogmatic Theology, and the professor of Canon Law, and some others of the priesthood. These learned and courteous and agreeable persons were members of the order of Jesuits, and were an ornament to any society with which they were connected; and they were not likely, when shewing to me some tablets taken from the Catacombs, and selected on account of their inscriptions, and deposited in the Collegio Romano, to omit the fair opportunity which they offered, of impressing me with the value of those inscriptions as evidences of the ancient faith and practice of the Church of Rome.

I stated frankly that I had spent some time in the Catacombs, and that I had no great faith in the conclusions which some of my kind friends of Rome habitually deduced from them.

They asked me, what were the conclusions to which I referred, and why I should doubt what seemed so evident to them.

I replied, that “the Congregation of Relics” once came to a decision, as to the relics found in the Catacombs:—that that decision was to the effect, that the appearance of a palm-branch graven on a tomb-stone, and the appearance of a vessel tinged with blood, were to be received as sure and certain signs of a martyr’s grave. Such was their decision. But since that decision was recorded, much more has been brought to light, which has proved the erroneous character of that conclusion of the congregation. For example. Some of those vessels, supposed thus to have been vessels of martyr’s blood, have been found on careful examination to be of a form and make long subsequent to the age of persecution; and to exhibit signs painted or graven upon them, which could not have been so graven or painted till after the times of martyrdom, inasmuch as they were not invented till years long subsequent. And again, in reference to the palm-branch, it has been clearly ascertained that the graving of a sprig or branch, which they call a palm, is frequently found on the graves of those who were undoubted heathens ; and also on the graves of infants too young for martyrdom, and also on graves of a period subsequent to the age of martyrdom. The decision therefore of the congregation of reliques, has been altogether rejected of late years, even among all the learned of the Roman Church. It is altogether rejected even by yourselves. I added, that the decision of the congregation was well enough for the few items of knowledge then in their possession ; but inasmuch as their confident decision is now universally exploded, it had shaken all confidence on my part, in the peremptory statements so frequently made at Rome, in reference to the inscriptions found in the Catacombs. I felt constrained to examine and judge for myself.

I perceived that this remark on my part had its effect—the effect which I desired—in lowering the tone of confident assertion and bold statement, which my friends had been exhibiting while we were looking over the library. They at once stated, however, that they were not referring to the decisions of the congregation of reliques, respecting the graves of martyrs as distinct from the graves of other saints ; but to the inscriptions and figures graven upon the tablets, as indicative of the fact that certain religious practices, against which Protestants objected in the Church of Rome, and which were made a ground of protestation and separation, were religious practices prevalent among those who were the saints and martyrs of the primitive Church. On my asking to what religious practices they especially alluded, one of my friends replied, by referring to the practice of invocation of saints—praying to the saints, adding that there was no doubt as to the existence of the practice, as it was evidenced in the inscriptions.

I asked—to what inscription, and what words, he alluded, as I had observed nothing of the kind.

He replied, by boldly stating that some of the tablets were inscribed with the “orate pro nobis,” or rather, correcting himself, “ora pro nobis.”

I said that I had seen nothing of the kind—that I had carefully examined the great collection of inscribed tablets deposited in the Vatican—that some of them, indeed the larger portion, had no evidence or trace of Christianity, beyond a cross or some anagram or emblem of Christ, as the ship or the fish, or the Greek letter X, or the A, and Ω, or some other of the various symbols of the Christian faith ; —that some commenced with the solitary word “Pax”—some concluded with the words “in pace,” or “in Christo,” implying that the person either lived or died in peace or in Christ, in the peace of God or in the faith of Christ ;—that I had observed many inscriptions stating that the person lived in peace, “vixit in pace,” and only one vivas in pace, expressive of the sigh or wish of the survivor, that the person might live in peace ; and very few others of the same import. And that in the large variety of inscriptions which I had had an opportunity of examining, I had never seen or heard of more than one with either ora or orate pro nobis.

My friend replied, that there was no doubt of the fact that there were such inscriptions, and that they actually possessed one in the college, and that he had seen the inscription, so that there could be no question as to the prevalence of the practice of saying the orate pro nobis—praying to the saints to pray for us.

I reminded him, that there were collected about two thousand inscriptions—that these were taken chiefly from the monumental tablets of the Catacombs—that they were cited as the representatives of the opinions of the primitive Christians—and that all he was enabled to say was, that among these two thousand he had seen one with this inscription! I then added, that considering the heathens of Rome prayed to their departed heroes, it was no more than natural that some few of these, on embracing Christianity, more in profession than in reality, might ignorantly continue the practice, and pray to some departed saint; and that such an exception could prove nothing in favor of the practice—that so isolated an instance as one inscription could only serve, like an exception, to prove the rule, and the real wonder was that more could not be found, and the fact that more were not found among the thousands collected, proved powerfully that it was not the practice of the primitive Christians to inscribe the ora pro nobis on their tombs. The inference was that they did not pray to the saints.

He answered this by saying, that I must at least acknowledge, that the inscription implied that the saints in heaven prayed for us—that after they died they did not lose their holy sympathies for us, nor their love of prayer for those whom they loved in life, and whom they left behind them in this vale of tears; and that if they thus prayed for us, it could not be wrong for us to ask their prayers, now that they are in heaven, as we had often asked them while they were yet upon earth.

I replied, that even his own interpretation of the inscription, implied rather that the saints in heaven prayed for the saints on earth—that they prayed for us—and that I felt that there was a wide difference between our supposing that they prayed for us, and our praying to them. I believed that it was a very early opinion among Christians, that the departed Christians or saints were in the presence of God, and prayed to God for them ; but I felt this was widely different from our praying to them—offering those prayers to them, which should be offered only to God.

He expressed himself greatly pleased, at my acknowledgment of such opinions as being prevalent very early in the Church ; and he spoke as if he thought there was little or no difference between their praying for us, and our praying to them ; and then went on to say that there was a marked distinction to be observed in the inscriptions on the monuments of the Catacombs. One class, he stated, contained such expressions as requiescat in pace—may he rest in peace—may he be refreshed, may he be comforted ; all this class are the monuments of Christian persons generally, and these inscriptions are prayers for the dead. The other class are the monuments of martyrs, who pass at once into the beatific vision of God, and who therefore do not need those prayers for their peace, refreshment or comfort. Therefore those prayers are omitted ; and this was the real cause of there being so many monuments without prayers. It was because there were so many martyrs.

I said that I could not assent to his ideas of either class—that the fact of there being no prayers for the dead, or to the dead, inscribed on the monuments, was to me an evidence that the Christians of those days neither prayed for the dead nor to the dead ; and that this was a much easier way of accounting for the omission, than supposing that all these were the monuments of martyrs, a supposition for which, as far as I could judge, there was not the faintest foundation. And as for the statement that the words requiescat in pace, and such similar expressions were inscribed on the tablets, I could only say I had never seen such among all I had examined, that is, among all the collection in the Vatican, a collection larger than all other collections in the world combined. Such an instance might be there, I heard there was, but I saw nothing like it; on one tablet indeed I had seen the natural and loving ejaculation vivas in pace, may you have peace! and this appeared to me no more than a wish expressed to the dead, rather than a prayer addressed to God. I added that I could only speak of what I had myself seen. It was possible he might have had larger and better opportunities of informing himself, and that he had probably examined them more closely; but that I apprehended there might be some mistake on his part, and I would therefore feel obliged by his shewing me some inscription of the kind.

The reply to this was, conducting me to several tablets, and pointing to one on which was rudely engraved or scratched, the figure of a man in a kneeling posture.

My friend pointing to this, and observing that I was silent and could make nothing of it, said that there was a kind of monumental language well known and understood—that it was derived from a comparison of a large number of inscriptions—that when a tablet was found without a prayer for the dead, it was to be regarded as the tablet of a martyr; and that as martyrs go at once into the vision of God, they do not need any prayers, and therefore no prayers are inscribed on their tablets; that instead of such prayers there was some emblem, as a representation of a person standing in the attitude of prayer, or as the figure of a kneeling man, that is, the figure of a man praying to the martyred dead ; and thus embodying not indeed the words but the idea of the ora pro nobis. He said that this was a matter very well known and understood, by those who were acquainted with the language of the monumental inscriptions.

I could not but smile at this statement. I had seen so many of these monuments without any thing that could imply a prayer for the dead, that I had concluded from thence that the primitive Christians did not cherish such a practice as praying for the dead, in the age of the Catacombs. But my friend of the order of Jesuits, assigned as the reason for so marked an omission, that all such monuments are those of the martyrs, who were in no need of such prayers ! Thus variously do different minds look upon the same things.

I remarked in a doubting tone, that my friend seemed to regard the kneeling or praying figure as the representation, not of the martyr, but of some living friend.

He said that the monumental language demanded this. A martyr could not require prayer, and therefore the figure could not represent the martyr himself—that it must therefore represent some one else, perhaps his friend, or relative, or follower, who erected the tablet, and who engraved his own representation on the tablet, to shew himself in the act of praying to the departed and glorified martyr—that this was the well-understood language of such inscriptions, and that I might depend on this interpretation.

I replied, that his process of reasoning did not strike me as very logical. He found tablets without prayers for the dead, and at once concluded that they were the monuments of martyrs who needed no prayers; and now he found a figure of a praying man, and at once concluded it could not represent the man buried beneath the monument, but the living man who erected the monument. I understood that the monument was always the monument of the dead—that the inscription was always with reference to the dead—that any picture or image, or other representation, was designed for the dead; and that it was quite new to me, to hear of their representing the living. I regarded it as representing the dead, and accordingly in the monuments of the Catacombs, such figures are always of the same sex as the dead person.

[In a subsequent conversation at my own residence, with one of my friends from the Collegio Romano, this subject was renewed, and I was not a little surprised at finding a new and different interpretation given of this figure. It was then argued that the kneeling figure represented the buried dead—that it represented him as kneeling in prayer, and that it thus shewed that the saints and martyrs in heaven pray, and that as they cannot pray for themselves, so they must be praying for us. In the Collegio Romano, the figure was said to represent the living, but at my own residence, it was said to represent the dead or departed! These inconsistencies are very frequent when arguing with different persons.]

My friend replied, that I was quite mistaken in regarding the figure as the representation of the departed one, for that the known language of inscriptions required it should be the representation of the living Christian, who erected the tablet; and it was designed to shew his belief in the martyr's enjoyment of the beatific vision of God, and that he was thus praying to the martyr to pray to God for him—asking for the intercession of the martyr—really, an ora pro nobis; and it was thus a clear proof or justification of “the Catholic Church,” in praying to the departed saints to pray for us.

I answered this by saying, that I could not think the figure represented the living Christian who erected the tablet—that such an interpretation was forced and unnatural, for that it was the custom of all ages, and of all nations, to represent the dead rather than the living on their monuments. I could not but think that the figure was designed to represent the dead, as one who had lived and died a praying man.

He at once caught at my words, and said that if I regarded the figure as representing the departed saint, then I must acknowledge it as evidence, that in the primitive Church they thought the departed saints prayed; and that as they needed not to pray for themselves, they must be praying for us.

I said that I did not regard the figure as representing the departed saint as praying for us in heaven; but as having been a praying man in his life;—that as the words “in peace,” and “in Christ,” implied that the departed had lived or died in the peace of God, and in the faith of Christ, so the kneeling posture might imply that he lived or died in prayer. I thought this the natural interpretation of the figure; and I said that in England, and I believed in other countries, and certainly in the Church of St. Peter at Rome, the monumental statues always represent the departed person—that it was usual to represent them, not as they were when dead, but as they were when alive—the warrior as a warrior—the orator as an orator—the painter as a painter—the clergyman as a clergyman ; and I observed that all the monumental figures of popes and nuns in St. Peter's, represented them as popes or nuns—represented them as they were on earth, and not as they are supposed to be in heaven ; and that in the same way we ought to regard this kneeling figure, as representing the departed Christian as he lived or died on earth, a praying man. He was represented kneeling, to shew he was a man of prayer—a Christian man. There is an example of it in scripture, where the conversion of St. Paul is described in the simple words, “Behold, he prayeth !”

There was no direct reply to this, but it was stated that I could not deny that the saints departed prayed for the Christians still on earth ; and that it was customary in the primitive Church to pray for the dead.

I said that I believed it was a very early practice in the Church to pray for the dead—that I thought it a very foolish, though perhaps natural practice—that it always seemed to me to be praying when it was too late, like praying for yesterday, for a thing gone by—but that at all events praying for the dead, was a very different thing from praying to the dead—that the two seemed very inconsistent, the former being wholly useless, as being too late ; and the latter idolatrous, as offering a prayer to a creature which ought only to be offered to the Creator.

It was evident that we were not likely to agree. The truth was, that surrounded and assailed as I was, by four of the reverend professors in their own College, I was not disposed to be as gentle and as cautious as I might otherwise have been. One of the party called on me some days afterwards, in company with a lay-brother, and we resumed the subject in detail ; but there was nothing very important elicited.

As much use is made, by the priests at Rome, of arguments derived from the Catacombs, a few more words may be added on the subject. Those Catacombs have for centuries been in the possession of the monks of certain convents, and no one is permitted to enter without the attendance of one or more of these ; and they are constantly talking of new and wonderful discoveries of inscriptions, and reliques and chapels, which are sure to confound all opponents of the Church of Rome. In truth, they are able to invent any discovery that may suit them, and make any arrangements within the Catacombs, that may serve their purpose. They have exclusive charge of the Catacombs, and they cannot be regarded as over-scrupulous in their reported discoveries.

It is not however in the Catacombs themselves, that an anxious and earnest enquirer can obtain much satisfactory information, respecting the practices or opinions of the first Christians. It may be, and undoubtedly is, satisfactory to one's curiosity, to witness those dark recesses which were the scenes and theatre of some of the most striking events in Christian story. But all, or almost all, the monuments —the real mementos of the past have been removed. The marble slabs that sealed the graves—the tablets with their inscriptions, and all else that was real and certain—all that could be depended on as likely to throw light on the past, have been removed. Some have found their way into private collections, a few have a place in the Capitol, a few more may be seen preserved in the Jesuits' College, while the great mass has been removed to the Vatican, where they form a great collection,—great in number, in importance, and in interest. It may indeed take away somewhat of the interest of such monuments, the seeing them, not in their own position beside the graves of the Catacombs ; but still as there is no security against the Catacombs falling in and burying them for ever, it was of immense importance that they should be removed to some place of safety, where they may be preserved for ever. No place could be more suitably selected than their present position in the Vatican.

In the long gallery, called, I believe, la galleria lapidaria, by which the series of galleries of Sculpture are approached, there are said to be deposited and exhibited for examination, four thousand monuments or works of antiquity. Of these there is a very considerable portion connected with Christian antiquity. Inserted in the wall on one side are a vast number of monuments, tablets, inscriptions, being memorials of the heathen dead. In the wall on the other hand, are inserted a similar series of analogous monuments, inscriptions and tablets, the memorials of the Christian dead. The enquirer thus possesses at a glance all he requires for a comparison of the practices and opinions of both Heathens and Christians on these occasions. There is but little difference between them, beyond that of the Heathens, beginning with the words “Divis Manibus,” and those of the Christians, ending with the words “in pace.” Nor indeed ought much to be expected. The ties of near relationship are the same, whether among Heathens or among Christians. The natural love of husband and wife —the mutual bond of parent and child—the pure affection of brother and sister are one and the same, whether among Heathens or among Christians ; and as the griefs are as sad, and the mourning as deep in one as in the other, so the language of affectionate and sorrowing remembrance—the expressions of monumental inscriptions must be expected to be much the same, whether on the tablets of the cinerary urns of Heathen Rome, or on the monuments beside the Catacomb-graves of Christian Rome.*

Day after day, and week after week, have I paused in this gallery to examine these monumental inscriptions. It always occurred to me, that if a belief in the sufferings of the dead in purgatory—if a belief in the efficacy of the prayers of the living in behalf of the dead—if a belief in the matter of fact of the departed saints praying for the living—if a belief in the efficacy of any praying to or invocation of the departed saints—was held among the Christians of the Church in those early ages, when the Church used to hide herself—used to celebrate her worship—and used to bury her dead in the Catacombs, there ought to be, and there must be, some evidence of such belief in the inscriptions, so numerous, which are to be found in the Catacombs. The absence—the total and perfect absence of everything of the kind, seems to argue powerfully that no such ideas entered into the religious belief of the Christians of those ages.

There are two things observable in those inscriptions.

* Among the heathen inscriptions, is one which struck me as a beautiful memorial from a husband to his wife. It was to the effect, that never during their union, had she done anything to displease him but once, and that was by dying.

The first is, that while some begin with the single word PAX, almost all of them end with the words IN PACE or IN PACE, OR IN CHRISTO, or some cross or other anagram of Christ, expressing the same thing. There is seldom any word connected with this. The inscription will generally be found to contain the name of the dead, and the age or number of years he may have lived, as thus, “To Julius a pious and well-deserving son, he lived XX years in peace ;” or “To Evodia she lived XXX years in Christ.” A careful examination of a large number of these inscriptions, gave the impression that the intention was to convey the idea, that the person had died “in peace,” that is, in the peace of God, or “in Christ,” that is, in the faith of Christ ; and that nothing more or less was intended.

It is observable, that in a modern grave-yard in any Roman Catholic country, there are always expressions in the monumental inscriptions, which intimate the belief of the Church of Rome. There is a request to the passing traveller, to offer a prayer for the dead—there is a statement setting forth that it is a good thing to pray for the dead—there is a prayer that the dead may rest in peace—there is a request for the assisting prayers of the saints. These and others of a similar tendency, are found in every cemetery in Roman Catholic countries. But there is nothing like this—nothing that has the faintest resemblance of this, or of any opinion approaching to any of these, is to be found among the innumerable inscriptions collected from the Catacombs. The whole collection of inscriptions thus argues unanswerably, that those opinions which have been of late years so universally received in the Church of Rome, were wholly unknown in the primitive Church.

The other peculiarity in these inscriptions which deserves attention, is the system of engraving signs or symbols on the tablets. The cross, the ship, the fish are frequent ; and still more that common symbol of the cross, the Greek X, with the R, as the two first letters of $\chi\rho\sigma\tau\alpha\varsigma$, combined with the A, and Ω, the whole being intended to represent the dead as having died in the faith of Christ, the Alpha and the Omega. The ship, like the ark of Noah, seems to represent the Church ; and the dead is thus described as one saved in the Church of God. The fish, $\chi\theta\upsilon\varsigma$, a word composed of the initial letters of $\iota\eta\sigma\epsilon\varsigma$ Χριστός Θεος νιος Σωτηρ, was a very favourite symbol, and accordingly sometimes appears on the monumental tablets, implying that the dead had died in Christ. The dove is often added as the emblem of peace ; and Jonah and the fish as the emblem of the resurrection. Indeed, in all those inscriptions, whatever form they assume, there is conveyed the one plain and simple statement, that the person who lay buried beneath the tablet, was a Christian ; and all these several forms, assumed perhaps from the varying tastes of individuals, seem to be regarded as enough to describe the dead as having died in the peace of God, and in the faith of Christ.

This simplicity of primitive Christianity is a very interesting characteristic of those early ages. Indeed it is quite refreshing to the spirit, which is oppressed by all the garish shew and complicated ceremonials of the present times. It is absolutely a relief—a throwing off a burden, to let the mind turn away from a series of difficult and complicated doctrines—from a mass of dogmatical mysteries and scholastical subtleties—from a round of symboli-cal forms and unintelligible ceremonies, so associated with every phase of religion at Rome; and to let it rest for awhile amidst the simplicity that characterized the religion of whose who were "the destitute, afflicted, tormented" of the Church, and were compelled to hide themselves "in dens and caves of the earth." The men who were faithful amidst the fiercest persecutions, who counted it all joy to be able to worship God in the darkness of the Catacombs, and there lived and there died, were content to live in the peace of God, and to die in the faith of Christ, and to inscribe on the tombs of those "who resisted unto blood, striving against sin," the simple words IN PACE or IN CHRISTO. It seems to imply that the times are changed, and that we are changed with them, when we yearn for more.

CHAPTER XII.

INDULGENCES—THEIR NATURE MISUNDERSTOOD—THEIR TRUE CHARACTER AS EXPLAINED AT ROME—ILLUSTRATED BY THE INDULGENCES CONNECTED WITH THE HOLY STAIRS—BY THOSE OF THE COLISEUM—FACILITY OF OBTAINING INDULGENCES IN THE CHURCHES—AUTHORITIES FOR THIS—THE USES OF INDULGENCES TO THE CHURCH OF ROME—THE PRAYERS FOR THE CONVERSION OF ENGLAND—THEIR USE IN ADVANCING THE WORSHIP OF ANY SAINT—IN PROMOTING CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS—IN PROPAGATING ANY PARTICULAR FORM OF WORSHIP—INDULGENCES USED BY THE PRESENT POPE—FORM OF ISSUING THEM.

THERE is scarcely any item in the peculiarities of the church of Rome so little understood among us, as the subject of INDULGENCES. It has been much mistaken by some, and sadly perverted by others. There are too many among us, who, not having taken adequate pains to inform themselves, have too often been contending against the corruptions of former ages, or against some shadows of their own creation. Nor ought we perhaps to be surprised at this, when we consider that the ideas respecting Indulgences in more ancient and less informed times, were widely different from those usually taught among the priesthood, and generally received among the people in our modern and better-instructed times. Whether the doctrine of the Church of Rome has undergone any change, either in its essential nature, or only in its method of exhibiting it, is a point on which there may perhaps be some difference of opinion; but there can be none as to the matter of fact, that Indulgences at the age of the Reformation were practically very different from those of the present times; at least they were explained in a different manner and regarded in a different light among all classes of the people.

It was believed, both before and after the Reformation, that the Church of Rome possessed, in the person of the Pope, a power of issuing Indulgences. There were two great evils arising out of the manner in which the exercise of this power was commended among the people.

In the first place it was believed, that these Indulgences secured to the possessor not only the forgiveness of sins committed, but also a forgiveness beforehand of sins not yet committed.

In the next place it was a matter, not of belief, but of every-day experience, that these Indulgences could be purchased—could be procured by money.

These two evils attended upon the system. Whether they were only abuses of the system, as is now universally asserted among the advocates of the Church of Rome, or whether they were evils natural and essential to, and growing out of the system itself, this at least seems certain, that at the age of the Reformation, the advocates of the Church of Rome, in commending their Indulgences, taught that they secured the forgiveness of sins still uncommitted, and that they could be procured by purchase. And it is also certain that it was the open and audacious sale of Indulgences that evoked the first movements of Luther to-

And it is this historical record that has proved the origin of the opinions very generally entertained among us on the nature of Indulgences. It is too often forgotten, however, that the authorities of Rome, recognising the existence of these evils, promised their reformation and thus practically modified the system.

The doctrine of indulgences, practically considered, as now held in the church of Rome, is as follows :

It is held that there are two kinds of punishment for sin, according as the sin is mortal or venial, repented or not repented of. These two kinds of punishments are technically described as “the eternal punishment” and “the temporal punishment” By the former is meant—HELL. By the latter is chiefly meant—PURGATORY. I say ‘chiefly’ because the temporal punishment is also supposed to include fastings, penances, afflictions, scourgings, and all such sufferings in this life as may be supposed capable of satisfying in any degree, the justice of God against the sinner. But as it is believed that few, if any, beside the saints and martyrs, have suffered in this life all the temporal punishment due to their sins, they are believed to undergo what remains of their prescribed punishment in the sufferings of Purgatory. It is called temporal in opposition to eternal, not as merely belonging to this life, but as being temporary—as having an end in Purgatory, in contrast to that punishment which has no end, in Hell.

It is this temporal or temporary punishment in this life, and then in purgatory, which is supposed to be mitigated by Indulgences. An Indulgence is never supposed to forgive a sin, but only to remit the punishment—the temporal or rather the temporary punishment of the sin. It is never supposed to remit the eternal punishment—the punishment of Hell. It has no reference to Hell, and has no relation to such sins as are supposed punishable only in Hell. An Indulgence is supposed only to affect the duration of the temporal or temporary punishment of this life or of purgatory, which it remits in part or in whole, according as it is a plenary or a partial indulgence. A plenary indulgence remits at once and for ever the whole punishment of purgatory, and thus secures exemption from that infliction. A partial indulgence, that is, an indulgence for five, or ten, or an hundred years, is supposed to remit five or ten or an hundred years of the sufferings in purgatory, and thus to expedite the transit of the soul to paradise.

It is well to be able to cite authority on a subject like this, and happily, that authority is at hand. While I was at Rome in the year 1844, the authorities formally sanctioned a work upon this subject. It was entitled 'A collection of prayers and pious works, to which are attached the sacred Indulgences.' It contains many prayers, offices, ceremonies, works, and describes the amount of indulgences which the church of Rome attaches to each, so that every one desirous of an indulgence may find in this book the office or ceremony, the prayer or work, by which it can be obtained. The book has been compiled with the sanction, and published with the authority, of 'THE SACRED CONGREGATION OF INDULGENCES'—the highest authority on this subject in the Church of Rome, and without which even the Pope himself never issues an Indulgence. The decree of ‘the congregation’ together with the signature of the Cardinal Prefect of the Congregation are added in the book, to ensure its reception as authorized ; and as the present is the eleventh edition, the decree takes care to specify that it is this eleventh edition—this present edition now before me, which is so authorized. This decree is dated from the office of ‘the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences at Rome,’ November 13, 1843, immediately before its publication. From the introduction to this book, I extract the following.

“ Sin produces in the soul two most bitter fruits—Guilt, which deprives us of the favour and friendship of God ; and Punishment, which prevents our enjoyment of Paradise. This punishment is of two kinds : one eternal, the other temporary.

“ The guilt, together with the eternal punishment, is totally remitted, through the infinite merits of Jesus Christ, in the holy sacrament of penance, when we come to receive it with devout dispositions. As respects the temporary punishment, so commonly yet not always remitted altogether in that sacrament, it remains in a great degree to make satisfaction in this life, through means of good works and penance ; or, in the life to come, through means of the fire of Purgatory.

“ But who can penetrate the most lofty and secret decrees of God ? Who can ever know how much the Divine justice demands in this present life in payment of what we owe, or whether through means of such satisfaction the temporal punishment which is due, has been remitted by God either in whole or in part ? And to whom will it not appear a tormenting payment, the making the full satisfaction in the fires of Purgatory? Ever blessed and praised be our most compassionate and merciful Divine Redeemer Jesus Christ! He has indeed conferred upon the Holy Catholic Church from the time of its origin, the power of communicating to us, and of our participating in, the treasure of the Holy Indulgences, in the virtue of which we are enabled with the least inconvenience to ourselves, (con leggierissimo nostro incommodo) entirely to pay to divine justice whatever we owe for our sins, already remitted both as respects the guilt and the eternal punishment.

“ This is a treasure which continues for ever in the presence of God, the treasure of the merits and satisfactions of Jesus Christ, of the most blessed Virgin Mary and of the Saints, that is, the value of the satisfactions of the Divine Redeemer, which were super-abundant and infinite, and also of the most holy Mary, and of the Martyrs and of the other Saints, which was not required for themselves for the expiation of their own guiltinesses. These indulgences are called “ the Heavenly treasure ” by the sacred Council of Trent.

“ This doctrine the Supreme Pontiff of holy memory, Clement VI. taught, saying, that Jesus Christ together with his super-abundant passion left to the Church militant here on earth an infinite treasure, not deposited in a measure of meal nor buried in a field; but committed to the church, to be dispensed in a wholesome way to the faithful by the blessed Peter, who holds the keys of Heaven, and by his successors the Vicar of Jesus Christ on earth. To the abundance of this treasure the merits of the blessed Mother of God assist as a help, and also the merits of the elect, from the first righteous one even to the last. Such treasures being infinite, have never been diminished nor can be diminished, being as a boundless ocean which cannot suffer diminution, by any quantity we can take from it.

“ It is not however in the power of each individual Christian to apply this in his own mode, but only when and how, and in what amount, greater or less, the Holy Church and the Supreme Pontiff of Rome may determine.

“ Indulgences are usually distinguished into two classes : some are called, partial Indulgences, that is for some days, or some forty-days, or a year or more years, &c. Others are called plenary Indulgences, or Indulgences in the form of Jubilee.

“ By partial Indulgences for days, or for forties, or for years, &c., they remit to those who receive them, so much of the temporary punishment, for which they would have to make satisfaction either in this life or in the life to come, [that is in purgatory,] as they would have to settle with penances prescribed in the ancient canons of the Church, called the Penitentials, for so many days, so many quarantines, so many years.

“ By plenary Indulgences, or Indulgences in the form of Jubilee—which are the same in effect, only that in the plenary indulgence in the form of Jubilee, the confessors have the power of absolving from the more reserved cases, to dispense or commute some simple vows, &c.—they remit the whole of the temporary punishment for which we stand indebted towards God, even though entirely pardoned ; and this too in such a way that after worthily receiving a plenary Indulgence, if a person happens to die, the theologians affirm that they would depart directly to Paradise. They assert the same thing respecting the holy souls in Purgatory, when a plenary Indulgence is applied to them by our prayers, "suffragio da noi," and is applicable if the Divine justice sees fit to apply it.

" From all this one may learn, of how great a price are the Indulgences—of how great value and efficacy, and of what extensive spiritual advantage they may be to faithful Christians."

A careful examination of the foregoing—published at Rome, and authorised by the congregation of the Index in 1844—will unfold the opinions held at the present day on the subject of Indulgences in the Church of Rome. It contains the following propositions :—

1.—After the guilt of sin is forgiven, there remains a temporary punishment to be endured. This consists of sufferings, to be endured either in this present life, where it assumes the forms of fastings, penances, mortifications, &c., or in the life to come, where it is connected with the fires of purgatory, and where all that remains on the sinner must be expiated.

2.—There are some persons, as the Virgin Mary, the Martyrs, and the Saints, whose lives have been so holy and meritorious, as that they possess merit enough and more than enough for themselves, for their own forgiveness and salvation. And this merit to spare—this superabundant merit—this superfluous merit of theirs, is added to, and assists and increases the infinite merits of Jesus Christ.

3.—These infinite merits of Jesus Christ on one hand, and these superfluous merits of Mary, the Martyrs, and the Saints, which remained over and above their own necessities, go to constitute a treasury of merit in the possession of the Church of Rome.

4.—The Church of Rome has power to take such portion of this treasure of merits, and apply it as may be necessary to such persons as may stand in need of it ; and shall have complied with the required conditions. This is done in the form of an Indulgence, and can only be done by the Pope, who as the successor of Peter, possesses the power of dispensing this treasure.

5.—The Indulgence thus ceded, secures to the recipient such a supply of merits—merits of others, not his own—merits out of the treasury of the merits of Christ, Mary, Martyrs, and Saints, as may be named in it. If it be for one hundred days or one hundred years, it applies an amount of merits sufficient to satisfy for the temporary punishment of this world or of Purgatory, which should otherwise remain to be endured for that hundred days or hundred years by the body on earth, or by the soul in Purgatory.

Such are the doctrines respecting Indulgences, as now held and taught in the Church of Rome. It will at once be perceived, that they apply not to the guilt of sin, but to that which is practically of more importance, namely, the punishment of sin. And it may also be perceived, and it is a most important item in the matter, that an Indulgence of three hundred years must have reference to the temporary punishment in Purgatory, and not merely to the temporary punishment of this life ; inasmuch as the measure conceded exceeds the possible space of human life : so that although such an Indulgence, and all Indulgences, may theoretically apply both to this world and to Purgatory, yet for all practical uses they mainly apply to Purgatory. And therefore, dealing with the subject practically—an Indulgence may be regarded as the remission of the sufferings in Purgatory for the space of time which is specified, and consequent admission of the soul to heaven, all the earlier according to the days and years accorded.

It will at once be perceived, that this is not a forgiveness of sins not yet committed, or a permission to commit a sin contemplated. The real doctrine is sufficiently objectionable, not to stand in need of any exaggeration. It is practically the assertion of a power in the Church of Rome, to lessen the years of suffering in Purgatory ; and so to expedite the soul in its passage from that imaginary region to the glories of Paradise.

And now to illustrate the practice.

It is scarcely possible to form a just conception of the numbers and extent of Indulgences—the mode in which they are applied, or the facility with which they are obtained, without a visit to the churches, the stations, the convents, and holy places of Rome. There is scarcely a church or a station, a convent or a holy place—there is scarcely a service, or a ceremony, a profession, or other act of religion, which has not its own special and peculiar Indulgences ; and these are so numerous, and so easily obtained, that Indulgences for some hundreds of years may easily be secured by the religious exercises of a single day. It is a certain fact, that the religious efforts of a man—supposing him to possess the required dispositions—continued for one day, may easily secure Indulgences for several hundred years! A visit to certain churches that are privileged, offering a prescribed prayer at each—a visit to certain crosses, and images and pictures, repeating some appointed prayer, or performing some prescribed homage, as kissing them, kneeling before them, &c.—a visit to some stations, with the usual ceremonies, entitle the persons to Indulgences that extend through centuries.

Adjoining the Palace of the Lateran, and the Basilica or church of St. John of the Lateran, is a very fine building, consisting chiefly of five lofty arches, and containing within each arch a lofty flight of marble steps. Perhaps the nature of the building will be better understood, by imagining five lofty flights of steps erected close to each other, and all ascending to one and the same gallery, while a wall is raised to separate each flight, and each is vaulted or arched over so as to be quite distinct in itself, though all ascend and open on the same gallery. The centre flight is called the Holy Stairs (santa scala) and is said to have been the flight of stairs belonging to the palace of Pontius Pilate at Jerusalem. The mere fact of its having belonged to such a heathen man, would not in itself have imparted any peculiar sanctity to it, but it is asserted, though on what authority we are not informed, that our Lord was dragged up and down these stairs under such circumstances of suffering that they were stained by his blood. This has accordingly invested them with the character of sanctity, and many and great are the privileges conceded to all persons who devoutly visit them. It is true that in a church in Germany, near Bonn, they claim the possession of these same stairs of Pontius Pilate, and they freely denounce as a base imposture all pretence to the possession of the true and real Santa scala, at Rome. They argue with no small shew of reason that the stairs at Bonn and the stairs at Rome cannot both be authentic—that one must assuredly be a mere fiction and base imposition upon the faithful, and that as the stairs in possession of the monks near Bonn are undoubtedly true, and proved to be true by the most wonderful miracles of healing the sick, restoring the blind, and strengthening the maimed, constantly performed there, so the stairs at Rome, pretending to be the holy stairs of Pontius Pilate, are undoubtedly false and fictitious. Notwithstanding all this however, the stairs at Rome maintain their character and their votaries, and their wonderful indulgences.

“ One of the sacred memorials of the sufferings of our Lord Jesus Christ is the Holy Stairs, and it is worthy of every act of religion and devotion, as having been ascended more than once by our divine Redeemer, and having been consecrated by his precious blood in the last hours of his life. Since then—after being brought from Jerusalem to Rome at the expence of the Holy Empress Helena, about the year 326, and placed near the Patriarchal Lateran Basilica, and afterwards magnificently placed by Sixtus V., in 1589, in a chapel celebrated in the whole world, called, the Holy of Holies—it was much frequented, and, through the piety of faithful christians of every class and condition, was ascended devoutly and on the knees.

“ In order for ever to excite the faithful to so pious and useful an exercise, the Holy Leo IV., about the year 850, and Pascal II., by his Bull of August 5, 1100, being the first of his Pontificate (of which the originals are kept in the archives of the said Basilica) conceded nine years’ indulgences for each of the twenty-eight steps of the said Holy Stairs, to whosoever with a truly contrite heart ascends them kneeling and praying, and meditating on the sufferings of our Lord Jesus Christ.

“Pius VII., afterwards by a decree of the Holy College of Indulgences, on 2nd September, 1817, renewed and conceded for ever the fore-mentioned indulgence, making it applicable also to the souls in purgatory.” Raccolta, p. 59.

It is apparent from this, that the devotee obtains an indulgence of nine years for each step, and as there are twenty-eight steps, he may secure by one complete performance an indulgence of 252 years !

The mode of performing this pilgrimage is as follows.

The devotee on approaching the stairs sprinkles himself with holy water, makes the sign of the cross, and then kneels at the lowest step. There he usually remains either in meditation or in prayer rather less than one minute. He then ascends one step on his knees, never rising upon his feet, which is regarded as approaching sacrilege, but always on his knees. There he usually remains as before, rather less than a minute, and very seldom exceeding a minute. And he gradually ascends, meditating or praying, and still upon his knees, till he has completed the whole flight of twenty-eight steps, and attained the gallery, where there is an altar and representation of the crucifixion ; he then descends one of the other flights upon his feet, and the performance is completed. The whole performance generally occupies from twenty to thirty minutes. He now possesses an indulgence which secures to him such a supply of merit, not his own, but out of the church’s treasury of superabundant merit, as will overbalance 252 years of sufferings in purgatory ; and will expedite by 252 years his admission to the glories of paradise! And not only this, but in case he does not himself stand in need of so great a supply, he is able to apply the surplus to the account or credit of any other soul in purgatory which he may charitably wish to relieve! This additional privilege was conceded so lately as 1817 by Pope Pius VII.

There is something strange in all this. It might awaken a smile, but for the frightful wickedness of the imposture, and the still more frightful ruin it entails on the souls of the multitude. I have seen priests and monks, gentlemen and ladies, shepherds and peasants, soldiers and women, all engaged in the acquisition of this indulgence. And though I have often visited this place, and observed sometimes very few persons, yet on one occasion I reckoned ninety-five persons crowded together on their knees on the stairs at one moment, while there was an unceasing stream of votaries arriving and departing, sufficient to maintain that number in actual performance for a large portion of the day.

The Coliseum presents another illustration of this system. It could scarcely be supposed that this most magnificent of ruins, so long the arena of Pagan superstition and of heathen sports, could be rendered what it now is, and so arranged as to minister in the wildest extravagance to the superstition of modern Rome. There are two entrances to the arena. Within one is an altar with two pictures, one of Christ, the other of Mary. And within the opposite entrance is a small marble slab or tablet inserted in the ruins. On this is engraved a representation of a cross, and the following inscription,

As if this were not sufficient reward to all who visit the ruins of the Coliseum, the eyes of the visitant immediately on entering fall upon a tall wooden cross erected in the centre of the arena. Affixed to this is a notice as follows,—

And thus the pilgrim, by kissing these two crosses of the Coliseum, a service which may be accomplished in the space of one minute, may secure indulgences for above 600 days;—an exemption from Purgatorial suffering for 600 days! By kissing these two crosses he will gain admission to heaven 600 days earlier than he otherwise would! And yet this is as nothing compared with the other indulgences that remain for those who visit the stations—the fourteen stations which surround the arena. These stations are called the via crucis, or the way of the cross, and the privileges annexed are stated to be the same which are conceded to those who become pilgrims, and visit the Holy Land, the Holy Sepulchre, the city of Jerusalem, &c.,—namely, plenary indulgences!

The same system of extending Indulgences is applied to those who visit certain churches. Almost every church, whether parochial or conventional—whether belonging to a parish or attached to a convent, is possessed of special and peculiar privileges. And the church is visited and frequented by the devout and superstitious, according to the advantages that it presents in the amount of indulgences and other similar privileges accruing to the visitant. There is scarcely a day in the year on which a man may not, as he passes along the street, obtain a plenary indulgence, or at least an indulgence of several years, by entering some particular church—such church, with the indulgences attached, being as regularly published as anything else in the calendar.

“ In order to excite the faithful to make such visits to the churches on the days on which there are stations, and there to pray according to the intention of the supreme Pontiff, the Pontiffs Saint Gregory and others, his successors, conceded divers Indulgences, which were confirmed for ever by Pius VI, with a decree of the Sacred College of Indulgences on July 9, 1777.” Of these Indulgences, there here follows an Index with the days and churches where there are stations.

“ Leo XII, afterwards by his own act, through the agency of the Sacred College of Indulgences, on Feb. 28, 1827, still further conceded for ever to all faithful Christians an Indulgence of forty years and forty quarantines. (i. e. forty years and 1600 days) applicable also to the dead, for every time that they visit, during Lent, the churches where there are stations, in the manner prescribed in the appended book. Furthermore, he conceded to all who have made such visits three times in three distinct days, a plenary Indulgence, &c.” (p. 298.)

In the Index here referred to, there are the days, the churches, the stations, and Indulgences, carefully arranged. I extract the following, in order to illustrate the system :

“ On Jan. 1, the Circumcision of our Lord Jesus Christ, a station at S. Maria in Trastevere—an Indulgence of thirty years and twelve hundred days.

“ On Ash-Wednesday, at S. Sabina, at S. Alessio, at S.

“ On the following Thursday, at S. Georgio in Velabro, and at Jesus é Maria—an Indulgence of ten years and four hundred days.

“ On the fourth Sunday in Lent at Santa Croce in Gerusalemme—an Indulgence of fifteen years and six hundred days.

“ On Palm Sunday, at S. Giovani in Laterano—An Indulgence of twenty-five years and one thousand days.

“ On Holy Thursday, at S. Gio. in Lat., after confession and communion—a plenary Indulgence.

“ On Holy Friday, at Santa Croce in Gerusalemme—an Indulgence of thirty years and twelve hundred days.

“ On Easter Sunday, at S. Maria Maggoire, after confession and communion—a plenary Indulgence.

“ On Easter Monday, at S. Pietro in Vaticano, and at S. Onofrio—an Indulgence of thirty years and twelve hundred days.

“ On Thursday, Ascension-day, at S. Pietro in Vaticano, after confession and communion—a plenary Indulgence.

“ On Saturday, the Vigil of Whitsunday, at S. Gio. in Lat.,—an Indulgence of ten years and four hundred days.

Thus much will be sufficient to illustrate the system. There is scarcely a day in the year on which these Indulgences are not attached to some one or more churches, so that a stranger is surprised at the manner in which a person passing along the street seems suddenly to recollect that by entering such a church, by the doors of which he is passing, he may advance himself some one or more steps on the ladder of heaven. He seems to think that he may as well give himself a lift at so little trouble. He enters the church—kneels at one of the altars—prays an Ave or Pater for about half a minute—leaves the church and resumes his walk, with the pleasant feeling that he has thus easily secured some twenty or thirty years' Indulgence ; and so shortened his sojourn in an imaginary Purgatory.

Having frequently attended these privileged churches on their privileged days, we were sometimes surprised at the small number of persons who attended notwithstanding the Indulgences. Except music, or a procession of relics, or something remarkable was anticipated, the number was much smaller than might be expected. I had imagined that an Indulgence of twenty or thirty years would have proved a greater attraction. But I soon found that the privileged churches, and privileged days, are become so numerous, and the Indulgences of every period of duration so common, and so easily secured, that they were becoming cheap—were falling in value in the eyes of the people.

But still Indulgences have their uses. The power of issuing them, as annexed to special forms of prayer or special ceremonies, or special works, is very useful to the Court of Rome. It enables the Pope to forward any special object in which he may be interested, or which may seem important to the interests or the influence of the Church of Rome. It is frequently found that an offer of Indulgences will effect among the people that which an appeal to their religious or charitable feelings has failed to accomplish. If, for example, it seem desirable for some convent of monks to bring the worship of some particular saint into more general fashion, their object is most effectually accomplished, not by an appeal to the judgment of the people, but by procuring and publishing a grant of Indulgences annexed to this worship. If it seem desirable to establish and sustain some charitable and benevolent institution, some hospital for the sick, or some home for the houseless, it is accomplished by an issue of Indulgences to every benefactor, rather than by an appeal to the charitable and benevolent feelings of the people. If it seems desirable that any particular form of prayer or ceremony should come into more general use, the object is effected not by a statement of the propriety or suitableness of the thing, but by a liberal issue of Indulgences to all who make use of that particular prayer, or join in that particular ceremony. This system seems to characterize every thing connected with religion at Rome ; and it is one of the most saddening features in the present state of religion in this city of the church. An appeal to a selfish hope of Indulgence for themselves will often effect among the people, that which an appeal to a generous spirit of Christian charity for others has failed to accomplish !

A curious illustration of this has very lately occurred. It was deemed fitting that the people of Rome should pray for the conversion of England from Protestantism to Romanism. It was thought wise to take the opportunity of awakening hopes at Rome arising out of the religious movement now going on in England ; and accordingly the following was duly issued by authority : I give it as it appeared in the public press.

festival of a Novena [nine day's service] in the church of Gesu [that of the society of Jesuits], in order to implore from Almighty God, the wider spread and happy increase of the Catholic faith in England. The Holy Father has not only listened favourably to this pious request, but has also promised to all the faithful who take an active part in the ceremony, a PARTIAL INDULGENCE of three hundred days for every visit, and a PLENARY INDULGENCE to those who attend the Novena five times at least, it being understood that at the same time such persons are to approach the Confessional and Lord's Supper. This Novena is to begin at eleven o'clock A.M., the 17th of January, in the forementioned church. Whether ye look, Christian brethren, at the great and noble aim in behalf of which these public prayers are offered to the Almighty, or whether ye calculate the advantage of the Holy Indulgence, by means of which we shorten the punishment due to our sins, in either case ye must in every way, to the best of your strength, interest yourselves in this matter, and take part in this pious exercise; by praying to the Giver of all good and the Father of all mercy, that he will pour out over that realm and its inhabitants, his light, and those gifts of grace, for obtaining which alone our prayers will be effectual."

Here the appeal is two-fold: there is an appeal certainly to "the great and noble aim" of the conversion of England, but no one can read the document without feeling that the appeal is mainly to self—to the selfish advantage arising from the promised Indulgences. There is not the high, noble, enthusiastic aspiration of enlarged and Christian hearts; but there is the petty, ignoble, contracted and unchristian love of self, stamped ineffaceably upon the system.

But I return to the “Raccolta,” and from that authorized work proceed to illustrate this matter, by an induction of particulars as the best and fairest mode of illustration.

I. The first shall illustrate the issue of Indulgences to establish or promote the worship or veneration of any particular saint. Some order of Monks resolves to patronize the saint, and they apply for Indulgences for all who exalt this saint.

“In order to propagate among christians the devotion to Saint Stanislaus Kostka, also because it is directed to increase that of the most holy Mary, Pius VII., by two de-crees of April 3, and May 1, 1821 ; and Leo XII., with other decrees of Jan. 21, and Feb. 25, 1826, these being examined and approved by the sacred college of Indulgences, May 13, 1826, have conceded,—

“ 1. A plenary Indulgence for ever on the feast of the said Saint, on the 13th of November, or on the Sunday on which, by the licence of the bishop, it may be for the convenience of the people to celebrate such feasts.

“ 2. An Indulgence of seven years, and two hundred and eighty days, during the ten weeks preceding his feast, in honour of the ten months of his noviciate, every time they visit the Church, &c.

“ 3. An Indulgence of one hundred days, for those who on every day of the Novena preceding his feast, assist devoutly, with contrite heart and praying, &c.

“ 4. An Indulgence of one hundred days, for every time each day, for whoever recites an Ave and a Pater before the image of the Saint in any church, &c.

“ 5. A plenary Indulgence on any day of the month, at will, for those who perform this exercise [praying before the image of the Saint] for one month continually after confession, communion, prayer, &c.

“ 6. An Indulgence of one hundred days, to whoever with contrite hearts shall assist at the retreat called after Saint Sebastian, &c.” (p. 271.)

From this it appears that an Indulgence of 100 days, an Indulgence of nearly eight years, and even a plenary Indulgence, may be secured by devotion to this Saint; so that a sinner may secure exemption from all the sufferings of purgatory, from all punishment there for his sins, and may secure an immediate entrance into Heaven, if only he joins in these devotions to this Saint! There is no allusion to our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, any more than if he had never lived, or suffered, or died! There is only this devotion to some supposed Saint, a devotion not commended to the piety or the judgment of men; but to their selfish desire to obtain indulgences, to shorten their own sufferings in purgatory!

II. The same observation applies to the founding and supporting all charitable and benevolent institutions, as Hospitals, Seminaries, Penitentiaries and similar establishments. In England these institutions spring from the spirit of benevolence, and they are maintained by the charitable feelings of the public, towards those whose misfortunes, or ignorance, or errors, have made them the fitting objects of such establishments. They are and ever will be the noblest monuments, and truest evidence to the practical character of “ the true religion established among us.” But in Rome they are founded and supported on totally different principles, and an appeal to the spirit of unselfish benevolence would be vain and useless. At least the authorities of the Church of Rome never made such an appeal, but deal only with the selfish spirit of her people, offering Indulgences to all who will become members of their associations, and benefactors of their Institutions; so that the funds are supplied to such benevolent and charitable establishments, not in a spirit of benevolence and charity towards others, but in a selfish desire to secure the promised Indulgences for themselves.

The best and greatest of the benevolent institutions of Rome—that of St. Michele, is a suitable illustration of this. The following is the mode of appeal by which the authorities have commended it to the people:

“ For the Holy House of Refuge.

“ Pius VII., by the rescript of the secretary of memorials dated Sept, 16, 1806, conceded the following Indulgences for ever to all the faithful, who shall assist towards either the spiritual or temporal well-being of the Holy house of Refuge, erected at Rome in 1806, near S. Maria in Trastevere, for those women only who having completed their assigned terms of condemnation in the public prison called S. Michele, wish to enter of their own accord into the said House, and live there far away from dangerous temptations, and there perform penance for their past transgressions.

“ 1. A plenary Indulgence on the day on which persons, after having confessed and communicated, shall be enrolled as members or benefactors.

“ 2. A plenary Indulgence on the 27th of December, for those who having confessed and communicated, shall visit the church of St. Giovanna in Ayno, when the directors celebrate the divine offices.

“ 3. A plenary Indulgence in the moment of death to those penitents who, from the heart, invoke the most holy name of Jesus and Mary.

“ 4. An Indulgence of two hundred days, to those who give or in any way procure what may assist the poor penitents, either spiritually or corporally.

“ 5. An Indulgence of sixty days to those who give them any bread, or give alms to the house, and every time that they procure such to be given by others, or in any way assist the same.

“ 6. An Indulgence of sixty days, every time any person gives alms towards placing the penitents in honest matrimony, or in a nunnery.

“ 7. An Indulgence of one hundred days, every time any person assists at the anniversaries or recitals of the offices for the deceased members and benefactors.

“ 8. Finally, the members and benefactors shall, during life, have part in all the prayers and good works, &c., which are performed by these women, and at death there will be celebrated three masses for his soul.” (p. 313.)

Such is the method adapted to the minds of the Romans, to induce them to support this important Institution. It is not an appeal to their sympathies for the destitute, but an offer of a plenary Indulgence to all who become members and benefactors. It is not an appeal to their Christian charity, but an offer of two hundred days’ Indulgence —as a recompense for every assistance that may be rendered. It is not an appeal to their love of God and their memory of Christ, but an offer of an Indulgence of sixty days to any who give food or money in its support, and an Indulgence of sixty days to all who give dowries to enable the penitents to marry or to enter a nunnery, with a share in all the prayers and good works of the penitents.

The Institution which is the object of this appeal is one of the best, if not the very best and most worthy of general and especially of Christian support, among all the Institutions of the Roman states. It is a Magdalen asylum. It is a House of Refuge for reclaimed prisoners. It is an establishment for orphans. It is a school. It is an Institution that appeals to all the best feelings of our common nature, as well as to all our Christian sympathies. The plea for the poor—for the orphan—for the erring, may not easily be disregarded; and yet this interesting Institution, notwithstanding its hallowed objects, would languish and die, having appealed in vain to the benevolent feelings and Christian sympathies of the Roman people, if the authorities had not purchased pecuniary support and personal assistance, by a prodigal expenditure of Indulgences. The benevolent and charitable institutions would all fail of support, if some such selfish end as the acquisition of Indulgences was not the recompense of such support. Happy would it be, however, if there had never been a worse application of Indulgences!

III. It has been already stated that this power of issuing Indulgences has its uses for the Church. If this power has been exercised for good and for purposes of good, as just detailed, it has also been used for the very worst purposes of superstition. The times when the issue of Indulgences was the signal of rebellion and revolt, the price of treason, and the harbinger of scenes of blood, have, it may well be believed, long since passed away for ever ; but they are still the promoters of superstition and the incentives to idolatry. It has been already stated that if it be an object with any convent of Friars, to bring any superstition, or ceremony, or prayer, into more general use, the object is easiest accomplished by obtaining an issue of Iudulgences, to be annexed to the utterance of the prayer, the partaking in the ceremony, or the joining in the superstition. It is recommended, not to the judgment of the people, or to their own spontaneous feeling of religion, approving that which is recommended ; but it is presented to them as that whose adoption will secure a specified number of Indulgences in the most easy manner.

The following will illustrate this in the superstition of “the Rosary” of St. Bridget as detailed in the Raccolta :

Indulgences annexed to the Rosary of St. Bridget.

“ 1. Every faithful Christian who shall say the Rosary or Crown of St. Bridget, can acquire one hundred days Indulgence for each Pater Noster, also one hundred days Indulgence for each Ave Maria, and also one hundred days Indulgence for each Credo.

“ 2. Whoever shall recite this Rosary or crown of fifteen decades, shall acquire in addition to the foregoing Indulgences of one hundred days, &c., a further Indulgence of seven years and two hundred and eighty days.

“ 3. Whoever shall recite the same Rosary or crown with other persons one or more, all and each shall acquire the same Indulgence as if all had been recited by one alone.

“ 4. Whoever shall recite the said crown of five decades every day through the whole year, being truly penitent and having confessed and communicated, and shall pray for the whole Church, &c., shall obtain a plenary indulgence.

“ 5. Whoever shall recite the crown of five decades once in the week, and shall have confessed and communicated on the feast of St. Bridget, visiting her church, or the parish or other church, and shall pray to God as directed, shall acquire a plenary Indulgence.

“ 6. Whoever, carrying with him the said Rosary, shall pray, bending the knee at the sound of the bell, for any person in the agony of death, shall every time he so does, acquire an Indulgence of forty days.” (p. 146.)

There are several other Indulgences of various durations connected with this Rosary or crown of St. Bridget. They are too tedious to be all inserted here, but they conclude with a note stating “all the aforesaid Indulgences can yet further be applied to the souls in purgatory,” so that an individual on earth may, by reciting this Rosary, shorten the duration of purgatorial sufferings, for his friends whom he may suppose to be in that imaginary region.

The Litany of the Virgin Mary is well known; the Indulgences to be acquired by reciting it, are thus stated in the Racecolta:

“ In order that faithful Christians may always be yet more excited to have recourse to the most holy Mary, that she may pray to God for us, and at the same time to honour her, Sixtus V. conceded an Indulgence of two hundred days for every time a person devoutly and with contrite heart recites the said litany. Benedict XII. by a decree of the Sacred College of Indulgences, dated Jan. 12, 1728, confirmed the same Indulgences, and Pius VII. confirmed it anew by the decree of the said Sacred College, dated Sep. 30, 1817; conceding yet further for ever a plenary Indulgence, to those who shall recite it on any of the five feasts of the blessed Virgin, the Conception, the Nativity, the Annunciation, the Purification, the Assumption. Such Indulgences being yet further applicable to the souls in Purgatory.” (p. 148.)

It will be observed that these and the following, and other Indulgences are of very recent date.

The means by which the use of any new form of prayer, however repugnant to the judgment of the people, may be advanced, is thus illustrated :

“ In order to increase among the faithful a devotion to Jesus and Mary, in the invoking their most holy names in union together with that of St. Joseph, to recommend themselves to them in the last moments of life, on which eternity depends ; Pius VII. by the decrees of the sacred college of Indulgences, dated April 28, 1807, conceded a perpetual Indulgence of three hundred days for every time they recite devoutly with a contrite heart, the three following ejaculations.

“ Jesus, Joseph, and Mary, I give you my heart and my soul.

“ Jesus, Joseph, and Mary, assist me in my last agony.

“ Jesus, Joseph, and Mary, I breathe out my soul to you in peace.

“ To whomsoever recites only one of these, the same Pius VII. conceded one hundred days of Indulgence, applicable also in both cases to the faithful departed.” (p. 49.)

Thus to induce the members of the Church of Rome, to offer this singular prayer to this modern trinity of persons, the church has offered three hundred days of Indulgences every time it is repeated ; and in case the votary is so disposed, or does not need these Indulgences for himself, they may be applied to the souls of his friends in purgatory, at the rate of one hundred days Indulgence for each repetition of the prayer !

There is something strange and startling—indeed idolatrous—in this prayer. It seems to call into existence a new trinity of persons, Jesus, Joseph, and Mary, in the bosom of the Romish Church, besides the ever-blessed Trinity of Persons, Father, Son and Spirit, in the Christian Church. It seems a dishonouring of Jesus by placing him in the act of prayer on a level with Joseph and Mary. It seems an act of Idolatry, to be praying to Mary and Joseph in the same form, the same words, and for the same object, as we use in praying to Jesus. It seems to place Jesus, Joseph and Mary on a perfect equality in that most solemn and formal of all our acts of worship—prayer. The same words are addressed to each ; the same petitions are asked of each ; the same formal act of devotion and worship is exhibited to each. These three are thus placed on an equality, without the faintest intimation in the form of the prayer that they are unequal ; so that as of the Apostolic Benediction, “ The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost be with you all ;” it is held to be an argument for the equality of the Three Persons ; inasmuch as it is a prayer offered alike to all, so it may in like manner be argued that this prayer of the church of Rome practically teaches her members the equality of Jesus, Joseph and Mary ; and thus, by worshipping these creatures equally with their Creator, that church is guilty of an overt act of idolatry.

It may thus be seen, that the power of issuing Indulgences is not without its uses in the church of Rome. And that by annexing them to any favourite object she may be anxious to accomplish, she finds many persons disposed and anxious to assist her, in the belief that thereby they are largely diminishing the duration or intensity of their sufferings in purgatory. The hope of so great and beneficial return for the exertion made or the subscriptions given, goes far towards increasing the number of assistants, and accomplishing the proposed object which the authorities of the church may have in contemplation. It may be the building a church or the founding a convent—the establishing an hospital or supporting a school—the frequenting some special altar or praying to some particular saint—attending some foolish ceremony or joining in some senseless superstition—worshipping some favoured image or praying to some miraculous picture—whatever it be, it is easily, or at least more easily, accomplished by an issue of Indulgences annexed to its performance.

Such is the modern system. In more ancient times, Indulgences were ceded to those who, as pilgrims, visited the holy sepulchre at Jerusalem—to those who, as champions of the cross, took arms and joined in the crusades for the possession of the Holy Land—to those who promoted the pious work of building St. Peter's at Rome, which was done by advancing money for that purpose—to those who took up arms for the persecution of the Protestants and extirpation of heresy ; and in the end, though perhaps it was only the abuse of the system, to all those who were able and willing to purchase them. But tempora mutantur et nos mutamur in illis : the system indeed is changed in many respects, for the Indulgences issued of old to those who took up arms for the extirpation of heretics, are now issued to those who pray for their conversion. And the Indulgences annexed to a pilgrimage to the holy sepulchre, and the holy city of Jerusalem, are now annexed to a visit to some holy altar in Rome ; and those once ceded to all who took arms and marched to fight for the possession of Calvary, are now granted to all who take the Rosary in their hands, or march with lighted candles in procession to some picture of the crucifixion.

Such is indeed the modern system. And Indulgences are now issued in as vast abundance as ever, so that there is scarcely a year without some large increase upon the amount already offered to the world. Indeed, it is part and parcel of some of the high ceremonies to issue indulgences on these occasions. The present Pope, Gregory XVI. (1845) has not been behind his predecessors in this particular, and has issued the following extraordinary ordinance :—see Raccolta, p. 319.

“A summary of Indulgences “Conceded by our Holy Pope Gregory XVI, to the faithful, who, retaining with them any of the crowns, rosaries, crosses, crucifixes, images, or medals, blessed by him or by those who have the faculty to do so, shall perform the following works ; which grant is renewed by every supreme Pontiff on his election, publishing the same in Latin and Italian.

“ In the first place, all faithful Christians are advertised, that in order to acquire the Indulgences with which the holiness of our Lord, together with the blessing of the apostles, has enriched the crowns, crosses, crucifixes, medals, it is necessary that they carry or bear about their persons some of the aforesaid crowns, crosses, crucifixes, medals, &c.”

This summary of Indulgences is of considerable length, and it will sufficiently illustrate the system to extract a few.

“ Whoever shall recite once a week, the crown of our Lord, or that of the blessed Virgin, or the Rosary, or a third part of it, or the divine office, or that of the blessed Virgin, or of the dead, or the Penitential Psalms, &c., and shall have been penitent and confessed and communicated on any of the following days, viz., on the Nativity, Epiphany, Easter, Ascension, &c., and shall have prayed to God for the extirpation of heresy and schism, for the increase of the Catholic faith, for the peace and concord of Christian Princes, and for the other wants of the Holy Church—shall acquire on each of the four mentioned days, a Plenary Indulgence.

“ Whoever shall do the same on the other feasts of our Lord and of the Virgin Mary, on any of these days, shall acquire an indulgence of seven years and two hundred and eighty days. Or doing the same on any Sunday or feast of the year, shall gain, every time, an indulgence of five years and two hundred days, and doing the same on any other day shall gain an indulgence of one hundred days.

the celebration of the mass or before communion, or shall recite some divine office, or that of the blessed Virgin Mary, shall acquire for every time an indulgence of fifty days.

“Whoever on Fridays shall devoutly meditate on the passion and death of the Divine Redeemer, and shall say three Pater Nosters, and three Ave Marias, shall gain an indulgence of one hundred days.

“Whoever shall pray devoutly for the faithful who are in transit (i. e. in the moment of death) and shall say for the same one Pater Noster and one Ave Maria, shall obtain an indulgence of fifty days.”

There are many other indulgences of a very similar nature, all contained in this summary or series of indulgences issued by the present Pope Gregory XVI.

As this issue of indulgences has taken place under the present Pope Gregory XVI., and as the above document is transcribed from the account of indulgences authorized to be published by “the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences,” and bearing the signature of the Cardinal Prefect of the congregation in the year 1843, it may serve as an illustration of the modern system.

I had always felt a great curiosity on the subject of Indulgences. I had often wished to see with mine own eyes, and to hear with my own ears the form in which they were dispensed and published, and while I was at Rome I anxiously watched for the opportunity. On Holy Thursday, the Pope gives the benediction from the balcony in front of St. Peter’s. And just before he utters it, an Indulgence is granted to all the assembled multitude, and two copies are flung from the balcony among the people, such being the formal mode of publication. The distance however at which all this is done deprived it of much of its interest for me, and I was glad therefore to have seen it more accurately in the Sistine chapel, where after the sermon and in the midst of the services, an indulgence was published by the Pope's command and in the Pope's presence. He was seated on his throne. A Cardinal stood on either hand. Above thirty Cardinals were seated in their place. Archbishops and bishops without number stood in the presence. The Cardinal Priest and his assistant priest were seated on the steps of the altar. The monk had concluded his sermon and had seated himself, when he again rose, and, fronting the Pope, read by command the rescript of Indulgence to all present. He resumed his seat and the services proceeded to their conclusion. I have since then been present on several similar occasions, when all curiosity on the subject was most amply satisfied.

It seems strange that amidst all the light of this nineteenth century—an age in which knowledge runs to and fro through the earth, the pretence to this power of issuing Indulgences should still be made. There seems something so irreconcileable to common sense and the principles of Holy Scripture in the doctrine, that the Pope, or any other bishop or priest can diminish the duration of the soul's sufferings in the other world*—that he can apply to one

“The number of ecclesiastics of all sorts (some 10,000 or 12,000) in Naples, naturally attracts attention, and we inquired of the Neapolitan advocate in what the utility of such an army of priests consisted? He quietly replied, “For the business to be done, we have not priests enough.” “How can that be?” “I will explain,” said he briefly: “if all the ecclesiastics in Naples were engaged from morning to night, they could not say even half the masses for the dead which they ought man the merits of other men, so as to supply his deficiencies and entitle him to claim exemption from the fires of purgatory for a specified period, and so find admission to heaven earlier or later according to the number of days or years the Pope may be pleased to specify in the indulgence —there is something so opposed to common sense and all Scripture in this, that men may well marvel that such and are bound to say.” This statement surprised us exceedingly. The advocate resumed: “The population of Naples is immense, and there is hardly a family the members of which have not for a long course of years bequeathed sums of money to ensure the saying of masses for the repose of their souls. In process of time the number of masses to be said in one year has accumulated to such an amount, that now 10,000 priests could not say them. A principal source of revenue to the priesthood is derived from legacies often charged on land bequeathed for these purposes. These charges are recognized and enforced by our tribunals, and it will sometimes happen that in two or three generations the greater part of the rents of a moderate property will be appropriated to the payment of the priests for saying the appointed masses for the dead. This actually occurred in my own case: the rents of my small paternal property were so appropriated. But the Pope will never permit the priesthood to abstract more than one-half the annual rental or one-third; and if the successive gifts for masses for the dead by successive owners of a patrimony swallow up the proportion mentioned of the rents, there is a mode of proceeding which I myself adopted to obtain redress. A memorial is prepared to the Pope containing a statement of the property, claims upon it for masses, and residue applicable to the support of the family. If his holiness thinks the residue too limited he increases it, fixes the sum for the priests, and remits his judgment to Naples, where it is received in the law courts, and has the effect of reducing the amount of the charge on the land.

“With respect to the masses for the dead, said and unsaid, a tabular statement is also submitted to the Pope each year; and he, taking into consideration all the circumstances, pronounces his decision that the masses remaining unsaid, shall be considered as said, and so they are accordingly. This short cut is equally effective, and the priest is paid for the service he could not physically perform, which is not unreasonable.” While the advocate gave this explanation, I thought I remarked a sceptical smile playing around his face, but he expressed no disbelief whatever in the doctrine.—Vol. iii. 104—106.

notions should be entertained, amidst the flood of light and knowledge that now pours through the world. Yet so it unhappily is, and the Christian, who might well laugh at such folly, is only left to weep over its wickedness, and to wonder more and more at the mysteries of Providence among which he lives.

CRITICAL NOTICES.

“ Mr. Seymour has certainly extenuated nothing in his account of what he deemed objectionable in the religious or superstitious practices which he observed at Rome,—but as certainly he has not set down aught in malice. His fairness, his desire not to overstate, and his desire to make every allowance and admit every reasonable explanation, are obvious in each page. These qualities are especially valuable, as his attention was confined exclusively to a phase of Roman life very superficially examined by other writers. However some of his readers may dissent from his inferences or arguments, all should admit that his facts give the most complete view of the religious condition of Rome hitherto attainable by the English public.”—Athenaeum.

“ We can safely recommend this volume to our readers, as being replete with authentic details, conveyed in a candid and Christian spirit; and as filling up an important chasm in the numerous descriptions of Rome which have been published.”—Church of England Quarterly Review, October.

“ An able and informing book, treating with freshness a country so exhausted as Italy, by directing the mind to a definite subject, and considering it widely and deeply. . . . The literary character of Mr. Seymour enables him to present his views and matter with effect. He is also a full-minded writer. Whatever subject he touches upon, he presents completely, and is exhaustive without tediousness.”—Spectator.

“ Mr. Seymour is no ordinary pilgrim, for he has succeeded in that most difficult of tasks, writing upon an old subject, a book which can deserve the name of new. Rome, the city, has been the goal of pilgrims by the thousand—artists, virtuosi, antiquarians, and litterateurs. Yet upon a subject worn so threadbare through generations of travel and controversy, Mr. Seymour, himself a traveller and a controversialist, has found many things to say which, if they are not in themselves altogether new, are at any rate grouped in new forms and presented from a novel point of view.”—Atlas.
